The Democratic Convention at San Francisco narrowly missed equaling the balloting record of eight years ago at Baltimore in its efforts to determine upon a Presidential candidate. At the Baltimore convention it required 46 ballots for President Wilson to come out victorious over Champ Clark, and in the Frisco convention it was necessary to take 44 ballots, only two less, to decide the fight between William G. McAdoo and Governor James M. Cox, the latter winning out after the Palmer delegates swung into his column following their release by the attorney general.
