JUST ONE THING AFTER ANOTHER

By Carl Goerch

Approximately ninety cases in connection with violating the national prohibition laws were brought up in federal court at Washington last week. Judge Meekins administered more than a score of sentences of three years and a day at Atlanta or Chillicothe.

An old negro—Henry Griffin—had been found guilty and had been given the customary sentence of three years.

"Have you anything to say before you are taken out?" Judge Meekins asked in a kindly voice.

"Nawthin', boss; cept'n—"

"Excepting what?" prompted the judge

"Cept'n that 'yo' folks 'round year suttling is liberal with other peoples' time. Das all Ah go; to say."

The liquor business down in Eastern Carolina isn't as profitable as it once was. This is due to several things. In the first place folks aren't buying as much liquor as they were a couple of years ago, owing to the fact that they haven't got the money to spare. In the second place, the period of depression has sent a greater number of folks into the liquor business. Competition for business is mighty keen. More liquor probably is being produced than ever before, but the market is very inactive.

In other words, the law of supply and demand has hit the manufacture and sale of liquor just as it apparently has hit every other line of business. Too much liquor is being produced and too little is being consumed. The result is that the price has been forced down to around $1.50 a gallon and every bootlegger has a large supply on hand

There's one thing that must be said in favor of liquor trafficking in Eastern North Carolina, and that is that the stuff evidently is fairly pure, from a comparative standpoint. I don't believe I ever have heard of any one going blind from drinking Craven County Corn or Martin County Brandy. Home-grown materials and supplies are used in the manufacture of the liquor and there is none of this foreign matter which so often is used up North and in other sections of the country.

The greatest worry Judge Meekins has to put up with comes along after a case is concluded and sentence has been pronounced. Immediately thereafter a flood of lawyers and relatives appear before him, begging for a lessening of the sentence. It is not often that their efforts are rewarded with any great degree of success.

There were three cases where husbands and wives received sentences of three years each. In all three instances, the husband was sent off to prison first. They'll stay there three years, following which they will return home. Then the wives will begin their sentences. It's a case of where the poor children will be crying; "Here comes papa—there goes mamma!"

Talking about liquor, and such things, I always liked the story of the inebriated gentleman who bumped into a strange and haughty lady on the street and then proceeded to apologise in profuse and eloquent manner. She regarded him with an expression of disdain.

"Sir!" she exclaimed, "I don't know you from Adam."
"You hic-ought to!" he replied genially. "W're not hic-dressed at all alike."
"And there is a yarn, too, of the pair of drunks who were driving home from a wild party. The car was going from one side of the road to the other.
"George," said No. 1. "If I were you, I believe I'd drive just a little bit more carefully."
"B'all right with me, Frank, but I thought it was you that was doing the driving."

I've heard a lot of folks say that all of our ills and ailments today—of a business, agricultural and financial point of view—are due to prohibition. That's mighty interesting. But how come that those countries which haven't got prohibition are a darned sight worse off than we are?
