The Confederate Note.

[The following poem has been widely printed as a waif without literary parentage. The latest story about it was that it was found in 1886 in Liberty county, in the State of Georgia, written on the back of a Confederate note. The real author is Major S. C. Jones, of Mississippi, who has for several years been a confidential clerk to Hon. L. Q. C. Lamar. The poem was written in 1865, and is published in a collection of Southern verses.]

Representing nothing on God's earth, now, And aught on the waters below it, As the pledge of a nation that's dead and gone, Keep it, dear friends, and show it.

Show it to those who will lend an ear To the tale this note can tell, Of liberty born of a patriot's dream, Of a storm-torn nation that's full.

The days rolled by and the weeks became years, But our coffers were empty still, Coin was so rare that the treasury'd quake If a dollar should drop in the till.

But the faith that was in us was strong, And our poverty well we discerned, And this little check represented the pay That our suffering veterans earned.

We knew it had hardly a value in gold, Yet as good cash soldier received it, It gazed in our eyes with a promise to pay, And each Southern patriot believed it.

But our boys thought little of peace or of war, Or of bills that were overdue, We knew it brought us our bread to-day, 'Twas the best our poor country could do.

Keep it, it tells all our history over, From the birth of its dream to its last, And the hope of success, it passed.

Moss Covered Pastures.

There is more than usual amount of moss in the old pastures this year, an indication, first, that the season has been unusually wet, and secondly, that the soil needs draining. Moss grows where nothing else will. The land may have an abundance of latent fertility, but only such rudimentary plants as the mosses can use it. If the moss has not appeared in previous years, plowing and reseeded with clover and timothy will cure the evil. So long as the clover lasts, the moss will not appear, as the clover roots will themselves afford sufficient drainage. After the clover dies out moss quickly comes in, as the grasses which succeed it do not extend their roots downward, and have less power to remove superfluous water.—Boston Cultivator.

To cure a felon, says a correspondent, mix equal parts of strong ammonia and water, and hold your finger in it for fifteen minutes. After that withdraw it and tie a piece of cloth completely saturated with the mixture around the felon and keep it there till dry.

Hop Cultivation.

Hop cultivation has no showing in the South, simply because its people have given it no attention. Yet in the report on the condition of crops published by authority of the Secretary of Agriculture October 1st, it appears that the average yield per acre for Alabama is 500 pounds, which is the same as that of Vermont and 20 pounds greater than that of New York. In the same report it is stated, under the North Carolina head, "hops are grown in almost every county of the State but only for home consumption. The roots never die in winter, and the increase is remarkable." All of which leads the Manufacturer's Record to wonder why the Southern States, and especially North Carolina, do not make this staple crop one of their regular sources of profit. Were Alabama hop-growers to give the same careful cultivation to that plant that Vermont and New York farmers do, their average would exceed that of the Northern hop-yards, while North Carolina with all natural advantages favoring her, could successfully compete with the most favored localities in the country. As it is, Southern breweries, that are all the while on the increase, must largely depend on Northern hop-growers for the stock.—Manufacturers' Record.

Curious Records of Ancient Civilization.

There is nothing which will more strongly mark the record of the nineteenth century when it shall be written than the patient research and intelligence which have unearthed the past, given it voice and utterance, and made us daily life of ancient Greeks, Egyptians, or Babylonians as being to the people of to-day as are the habits of the English under Alfred or our own ancestors in the days of Cotton Mather. Just as the naturalist can from the single bones of some now extinct animal build up a complete structure, so from a fragment of pottery, from some rude hieroglyphics, or from the ruins of a building, the archaeologist can bring a forgotten people before us, and make us acquainted with their social, their commerce, their architecture, and their literature.

The excavations and discoveries of Layard at Nineveh first gave an impetus to the work of this character; and since that time new fields of research have constantly been opened. Dr. Schliemann's discoveries at Troy stripped the Iliad and the Odyssey of much of their legendary character. Professor Langley's excavations in Rome, the story of which we have just read, was itself a revelation, revived the pluries of the Augustan era, and showed the form of the palace to throw new light on a period of history which has always been surrounded by much doubt, and the scant records of which led to so much conjecture and speculation. For the only record extant of a very large period in the life of the East is the Bible; and, if we are to believe the history, it is by a Jewish or over Jewish discovery in the East, if any thing, a question important not only to scholars and antiquarians, but to the whole of Christendom.

The discoveries made by Mr. Flinders Petrie have been the result of much labor, attended by obstacles of every nature, presented by the climate, Turkish officials, and the ignorance and avarice of the inhabitants of the country. These discoveries have now reached such a stage that it will soon be possible to know something of the life and architecture of the Israelites during the period of the kings, and to determine the age of the pottery and bronzes which are met with in the country. One excavation disclosed a city dated upon it, the latest colonists being Greeks, who had been driven off by the Great King downward, the excavations come face to face with the work of the earlier Jewish kings, probably executed by the same school of masons who built and adorned the temple of Solomon. As these discoveries continue, and the monuments of sculpture and inscription unearthed by Schliemann, shall be unearthed, and the fragments of the Hebrew form of the language of Palestine may be found intelligible to the modern eye, the study is fascinating; and it will have an important bearing on interpretation and criticism, and on the progress of a great portion of the human race.

Tanning by Electricity.

M. Munz, Professor at the Institute Agronomique, has recently published a highly favorable report on the Worm and Bale process of tanning by electricity. All the hides so tanned, says M. Munz, the appearance of hides tanned by the ordinary process. Tests were thoroughly well tanned after a maximum of four days in the vats. Further chemical tests showed that the tanned hides were not inferior to the leather as in the ordinary method. We may mention in this connection, that a large firm of tanners in Paris are sending out with every consignment of hides a certain proportion of electrically tanned ones, intimating that any of the electrical tanned skins which are not found up to the mark will be immediately exchanged for some tanned by the ordinary process. No electrically tanned skins have as yet been returned.

Mr. Balaie's face is heavily beamed, and he has of late allowed his beard to grow in rather a bushy fashion. It is not so trim and close clipped as in earlier days, and there is a slight stoop in the statesman's shoulders. His eyes are full of expression and life, however, and they tell us some of the things which have of late come over him. It is noted by men who know him well that the secretary has of late years lost something of the directness and brightness of speech which once characterized him. He is not only very slow and deliberate in decision, but he has adopted a manner which might be described in a general way of being indicative of gentle laughter.

What Every Girl Should Learn.

The Duchess of Marlborough has some excellent ideas on the subject of girl culture. "Had I a daughter or a sister," she says, "I should teach her adaptability, and that learned I should have no further anxiety for her future. Succeed! My dear girl, she could not fail; it would be impossible not to succeed for her pleasure, not men alone, but people, and the race is hers."

A Practical Suggestion.

She (daughter of wealthy man)—I don't want the people in this hotel to think we are newly married.

He (a poor clerk)—Don't you? Then you pay the bill.

Six Things.

The chief guide at Lauterbrunnen in Switzerland gives to each Alpine climber before he sets forth on his perilous journey an alpenstock and a half dozen words of warning.

May not The Companion give to its boy and girl friends a few practical hints to assist their upward journey?

First. That a quick voice, courtesy, and kind acts are as essential to the past in the world of a gentleman as of a gentleman.

Second. That roughness, blustering, and even foolishness are not manliness. The most firm and courageous men are usually the most gentle.

Third. That muscular strength is not health. A brain cramped only with fat is not necessarily a weak one.

Fifth. That the labor imposed on the boy of 14 will be easy to the man of 30.

Sixth. That the best capital for a boy is not money, but a love of work, simple tastes, and a heart loyal to his friends and his God.

Fourth. That a girl ought to know: First. That dwelling on a languishing eye, or an affected manner, will never deceive any one into the belief that she has a noble nature.

Second. That while the best ingenuities, and palaces, and cosmetics may fall in affecting her beauty, every secret thought of hidden emotion will leave an indelible mark upon her face which she can never erase.

Third. That the true gentleman, like every other jewel of great price, never thrusts herself into view. Neither her clothes, her voice, nor her manner challenge public notice.

Fourth. That the girl with whom young men romp and flirt is not the one whom they choose when they wish to marry.

Fifth. That as God has prepared woman and sent her into the world, to be a wife and mother, she should look forward to those conditions of life, not with silly and vulgar jeal, but with reverent, earnest effort to fit herself for them.

Sixth. That the "old maid" may find for herself a work and position as noble as that of any other woman.

These hints may help both boys and girls to reach a higher standing ground on the heights of life.—Youth's Companion.

Wrestling With a Bear.

An English resident in India thus describes in Longman's Magazine the performance of the large Asiatic bear which are occasionally brought from Cashmere to display their tricks at Calcutta:

The greatest objection is that each poor bear has his teeth pulled and then worn down, in order that the spectator may not notice the denuded state of his mouth.

Before the combat the man has covered his naked back with a thick coat of cowhide, but the rest of his garb is little more than a pocket handkerchief. He slips his naked arms and chest with his hands, and challenges the bear to "come on."

Then, standing fully as tall as he, waddles forward with his head concavely on one side, and after a few feints and passes, the man is locked in the bear's embrace. The cowhide on the man's back protects him from the bear's long claws, but to the one who sees the contest for the first time, the position seems very dangerous.

The man struggles and twists about, and tries in vain to slip the bear; all then seems to be taking its course, but the bear and all its ancestors, while he gradually seems to grow more and more exhausted. Just as the spectator becomes really anxious for his safety, there is a sudden twist—probably a preconcerted signal to the bear—and the pair roll over on the ground, the man promptly rising victorious and plucking his foot on his confederate's neck.

Throughout the combat the bear usually wears a stoical look of indifference, but often as I have watched the struggle, there are still times when it seems to me that some one ought to interpose. However, I never saw or heard of an accident.

If you pay a visit to the huts where bears and men usually put up together, on the outskirts of a town, you will find them living in a most amicable intimacy; indeed, if they are rounded in the early morning during cold weather, it is difficult to distinguish man from bear, as they begin to rise from their slumbers on the same bed of straw.

A Very Odd Battle.

As T. W. Singer and David Scully, of Laughlinstown, were on their way home from Ligonier a few days ago a most interesting scene presented itself at a point on the turnpike near the brick house. It was a mink and a blacksnake fighting. The mink would pounce upon the snake and sink its sharp teeth into its body every time. The snake would coil itself up and strike at the mink, but his strokes were like those of a drunken man. When his blow was spent the mink was not there, but in a moment the snake's pounces that brought blood from his length. The mink became frightened at the spectators and fled, when the snake was dispatched.—[Ligonier Echo.]

Frontings.

In a book lately published, "To Europe on a Steamer," the author says that on board the Italian steamer, plying between New York and Marseille, a white ox was kept as a supply of fresh meat; but the sailors grow fond of it to give it up, and it went to the end of the voyage unharmed.

Among the passengers was a poor little Polish lady, sailing with a sick child, which needed for its health a daily supply of fresh milk. "Oh, madam," said this woman to the author, "I was so happy to see the face of that ox. I thought now my boy will have what he needs—plants of fresh milk."

Restored His Wife's Health.

My wife suffered for years from debility and a general breaking down of health, the results of disease peculiar to women. A few bottles of Swift's Specific (S. S. S.) restored her to perfect health. It built her up, increased her appetite and weight, until she is now the picture of health. The speedy recovery of my wife from her long illness caused all my family, and several of my neighbors, to take S. S. S. As a tonic we are all delighted with it.

Baby Cured.

My baby had the worse case of Catarrh that I ever saw a small child afflicted with. The nasal discharge was very large and very offensive. Having some personal knowledge of the curative properties of S. S. S. I gave the baby a course of S. S. S., using nothing else. In a short time the discharge from the nose stopped, and the catarrh was cured entirely and permanently, as there has been no return of it since.
