THE VALUE OF CREDIT.

An anecdete has been recently told illustrating the benefit of mercantile character, which, especially in a time of Suancial depression is of more value than gold or coupous says the Youth's Companion. Years ago a young man landed in Loudon with nothing but s plan for securing subscriptions to a promising business enterprise. and a letter of introduction to an eminent banker who was one of his father's oldest friends. He needed credit, and could do nothing without it. So be presented himself and his letter to the banker, who asked him in his private office.

There the Englishman puts his friend's son through a searching examination to see if he were worthy of confidence, and if his scheme should receive favorable consideration. Satisfied with the result of the interview the gentlemau offered neither aid nor the benefit of his name by taking shares in the corporation the young man represented, but simply said :

"Meet me on Change at one o'clock to-morrow."

gal business intrusted to him wate took the unknown young man familiarly by the arm and walked up and down in sight of everybody, chatting with bim pleasant ly, and then said, "Good day !" The following noon the two met again, and walked together as

"Is there anything I can do for you?" asked the banker, with a shrewd suile a few days later. "Are you making progress in the sale of your stock?"

"I am," answered the young man. "I don't understand the reason wby, but everybody seems willing to listen to me. I have done better than I feared. No one has given me a single rebuff."

The respective and cordial personal consideration shown him by one of the most trustworthy moneyed men in London, put the stranger into a position where everybody had confidence in him. Those two interviews on "the street" gave him a standing which several years of mercantile struggle might not have achieved. Credit is necessary on 'Change, bat character is better than credit That is necessary everywhere, especially religious character, which is the highest kind of personal credit. You might get advice from a few moments' conversation with Baron Rothschild, and become rich. You may have an interview with a sincere Christian, and become good. Mr. Moody used to say that people came miles to see and hear him, boping by so doing to become Christians, and that brief personal interviews often led them to a religions life. Such is the power of all people eminent in good works. Christ knew what He was talking about when He spoke of drawing all men unto Him. To live so that a word uttered in an interview, or have our new shop (the old ten pin a prayer of ours may be of immeasurable value to the unhappy and the tempted, is no dream, but a simple and beautiful possibility.
