She started a little wabbly, but soon got the wheel going straight down the incline at a three minute clip before she realized that it was running away with her. Just then a cow and a calf loomed up in the street ahead. She gave herself up for lost and screamed. The experienced cow thought it was a new sort of locomotive whistling and got out of the road, while the calf stood squarely in the middle of the street, with its fore legs spread apart, its ears sticking out like cabbage leaves and its eyes fairly popping out of its head in astonishment.

just as she expected to collide with the calf it whirled around and with its tail over its back went bawling down the street. When the cow saw the queer looking apparition in bloomers chasing her calf, she started to the rescue, bawling at the top of her lungs. Half a Named in honor of Col. W. private business affairs. If the clerks were put on the public rolls and the money paid to them in person, there would not be much scandal. In that case $50 or $60 a month would he ample compensation, for there are thousands of young men and women in Washington willing to work for those wages. But members objected to having the matter made of record, as it is done in the senate, because they wanted to employ members of their families to do the work and pay them the money. A few might be courageous enough to say:

Prehistoric Trephining.

In her "Introduction to Folk Lore' Miss Rolfe thus accounts for trephining as found in the skulls of prehistoric people. Starting with the idea that there was entertained a belief of a separable soul, she thinks that early men cut holes in each other's skulls so as to allow the soul to escape. The lady cites the case of an old woman in Yorkshire who had presidents by plurality vote of all the two holes cut in her coffin, so that if an evil spirit was buried with her there should be a chance for its escape. It is

She Named a State.

The state of Washington is indebted to a Zanesville (O.) girl for the name it now bears. When the territory was organized, there was an animated contest as to what name to give to it between the towns of Seattle and Tacoma, and the latter recognized the fact that if the name of the state could be made Tacoma it would be of inestimable benefit to that city. A press dispatch to a Seattle paper announced that the matter would come up in the national house the day quirer. following, and that the indications were that the territory would be named Tacoma.
