A GARDEN IN TUSCANY.

The white magnolia opens with the day
To look upon a wonder world of bloom,
As if the rainbow met its earthly doom Beside its numesake iris and must lay luprisoned hars of flame and blossom gay Half hid beneath the clive's mountful gloom.
The flex branches veave a shadow loom
Across the marbles, where the fountain's spray Drips slow, like cool and unsung melodies,
And through the grass the little lizards glide,
Dazed with the drowsy fragrance of the tree
And love and life lie sleeping side by side,
For where still Eros lures the honey bees
A dark young lad dreams through the hot noor

The_ Devil's Inn.

BY M. QUAD.

If you have ever visited the city of Zacetacas, Mexico, you have heard the story of "The Devil's Inn" and been mystified over it. If you have not heard the story by word of mouth, you will be interested in it. On the highway to San Luis, about four miles out of Zacetacas, are the ruins of the inn. They have been ruins since 1884. For ten years previous to that the inn was unoccupied and gradually falling into decay. The name given it when it was built and opened for business was "The Holy Rest." The name had no peculiar significance. If holy men ever came that way, they found the place full of sinners. The landlord and most of his customers were a hard lot, and during the four or five years the place flourished it had a bad name. The authorities had about determined to close the inn up when it was suddenly abandoned by the owner. The most that could be learned from the servants was that a stranger came there one night and had a long and confidential conversation with the landlord, and next morning both were missing. The place was overhauled, but no traces of murder were found. The servants scattered, the doors were nailed up, and "The Holy Rest" was left to darkness and the bats. Of course it soon had the reputation of being hauntto one of the best families of Monterey, who happened to be in Zacetacas on a visit, made a wager that he would lease him, saying, I am a bird of expass a night alone in the inn. He rode out before dark, well armed and provided with lights, and was seen to enter the place by a window. Next day his naked body was found on the highway in front of the house. He had dog, and his clothing had been clawed off his body. He had been dead for hours, and it was the opinion of the doctors that he had been attacked by a wild beast. A company of 50 soldlers went out and searched the inn. The search was a thorough one, but no trace of man or animal could be found. It was discovered that the young man had been attacked in a particular room, and, after being killed and stripped, his body had been carried out, but the facts stopped there. A man, unless a lunatic, would not have shown such ferocity, and a man must have left traces behind him. If a wild beast, where was his lair? How did he manage to carry the body out? There was no manner of wild beast in Mexico who could have done such a thing.

I was one of the four American civil engineers employed by the local government of Zacetacas in the year named to make surveys for a drainage canal, and of course I heard of "The Devil's Inn," as it had long been called. That the people were earnest and sincere in their talk made no difference to me. I had no belief in haunted Prompt and painstaking attention given to every matter intrusted to his hands.

"I want to warn you against making any foolish move in connection with 'The Devil's Inn.' The place is surely haunted and dangerous to life, no mat ter what you may think. Don't be silly enough to pay it a night visit, as I hear you contemplate doing." I had contemplated nothing of the kind, but the chief had scarcely finished when I was resolved to take that very step. My chum was named Clark, a young man from Chicago, and I had no sooner broached the subject to him than he was ready for the adventure. For fear that the authorities might All legal business intrusted to him stop us we let only a few people into will receive prompt and careful attention. equipped with everything deemed necessary, we were driven out to the inn. After shaking bands and bidding farewell with those who had accompanied us we entered by an unguarded window, and the carriage drove off. It was a rambling one story building containing 14 rooms. There was an office or bar room, a dining room, a kitchen, and the remainder were sleeping rooms. There was a cellar under the kitchen only. All the furniture had been left. and everything was mold and decay. Our first step was to carefully inspect every room and the cellar, and we did not find so much as a rat. We looked for secret panels in the partitions and for hidden traps in the floors, but we

We lighted candles, braced the doors securely and started a bit of a fire in the open fireplace to drive out the dampness. We had brought our oipes, wine and a luncheon, with a pack of cards to divert ourselves, and either of us had the slightest idea neither of us had the slightest idea of anything occurring to alarm us. As we sat down to the cards our revolvers were laid on the table, and we laughed and joked without restraint. We had braced the doors shut with stout boards, and our first alarm came when one of these boards fell down and the door swung wide open so that we could look into the kitchen. The fall of the board looked like an accident, but there was something curious in the way the door swung clear back. Both of us were a bit mystified, but we arose and the way the door swung clear back. Both of us were a bit mystified, but we arose and the safe in the stomach. The unknown something that had flung us out had fired the place by accident or design, and the smoke stained adobe walls are yet there for you to see and wonder over.

Not Too Far Away. Robert Barr relates that once, speaking with Bret Harte, he upheld the rigid life Henry Thoreau had led at Walden Pond, as compared with the luxurious surroundings of many modern authors. Barr advocated a return to the simpler habits of our ancestors. "Yes," Harte replied, "living on parched peas sounds very fine in a book.
