Homer sometimes nods, so we are told; ditto even so great a journal of civilization as the Washington Post. It recently contained this amazing squib: It is appalling to think of the amount of space of congress for useless public documents. The word "amazing" is used advisedly when the general opinion of The Post on current matters is taken into consideration. For instance, The Congessional Record, at which so much fun'is poked, is padded too much. There is precious little sense in publishing any large number of the president's messages, as they are published in nearly all the newspapers in the country; but, as a rule, public documents are valuable provided they can be put in the right hands. I will give one or two of my own experiences in this regard, which, I will undertake to say, are by no means exceptional except in the fact that the district which I have the honor to represent is one of the richest agricultural districts in the

Before going to congress I had never read an agricultural report in my life, and I had seen so much fun poked at them in the newspapers that I didn't suppose any one else read them to any great extent.
