It is a well known fact that Democruts resemble Collins' famous ram in being men of their own heads. In a large measure it is every fellow for himself, even if not the devil for the hindmost. Still, there is one man, Hon. James D. Richardson of Tennessee, who is always spoken of as the Democratic lender of the house because he has twice been the nominee for speaker. There is another leader, however, who was never nominated for speaker. That is W. C. Adamson of Georgia, universally called Charlie by his friends, and all who know him are his house roll of Democrats. As the house bers have a multiplicity of things to do, it frequently happens that many members have no idea what the roll call is about until they inquire. Adamson, who is always at his post, saves them the trouble of inquiring on all political questions, for he keeps posted as to what is going on, and he is known to be as faithful as the needle to the pole in political matters. Consequently when his clear tenor sounds "Aye," or "No!" everybody knows how the vast majority of Democrats will vote. Adamson is our Democratic beliwether, to use a common western phrase. He is a capable man, a genial southern gentleman who wears his heart upon his sleeve. He is an able debater, knows what he wants to say and says it without circumlocution. He is popular on both sides of the house, but the fact that he stands the first Democrat on the roll forces him to be unusually vigilant. It's a post of honor, but a hard berth to fill.

The Brooklyn Eagle tells the following story of Adamson: Congressman Adamson of Georgia lives at the Hotel Varnum when he is in Wash-Lloyd of Missouri, who tells this story at
