It was cold in the old barn where we first set up the Philistine, so I built a little building like an old English chapel right alongside of my house. There was a basement and one room upstairs. I wanted it to be comfortable and pretty, and so we furnished our little shop coally. We had four girls and three boys working for us them. The shop was never locked, and the boys and girls used to come around evenings. It was really more pleasant than at home. I brought over a shelf of books from my library. Then I brought the plane, cause the youngsters wanted to dance. Then I brought the plane, be-The girls brought flowers and birds, and the boys put up curtains at the windows. To keep the three carpenters busy who had been building the wings I set them to made the furniture as good as they could Folks came along and bought it. The boys picked up field stones and built a great, spiendid fireplace and chimney at one end of the shop. The work came out so well that I said: "Boys, here is a great scheme. These hardbeads are splendid building material." So we adrertised we would pay a dollar a load for niggerheads. The farmers began to haul stones. They hauled more stones, and at last they had hauled 1,500 loads. We bought all the stone in the dollar limit, builing the market on bowlders.
