dent of the United States. His is a waiting policy. Notwithstanding all the grand stand plays of affection be- its key, became public property by three twixt him and Senator Hanna, there is no love lost between them. Quite the contrary At heart they bate each other as the devil hates holy water. They never can be friends. Fifteen years ago Foraker's chances of reaching the White House appeared better than William McKinley's, for then Mc-Kinley was only a representative in congress. while Foraker at the early age of forty-four was serving his second term as governor of Ohio and was the idol of all the young Republicans in the state. His successful tussle with Cleveland about the return of the captured Confederate battleflags gave him a national reputation, and his star was in the ascendant, but it speedlly went into partial eclipse. In 1889 he was nominated for a third gubernatorial term and was defeated by Hon. James E. Campbell through what Foraker and his friends have always deemed treachery on the part of certain Republicans in Ohio who desired to put a

Nevertheless and notwithstanding. constantly augmenting splendor till the day of his death. As McKinley grew, Marcus A. Hanna grew until he assumed presidential proportions-to Foraker's ineffable disgust. Foraker, being s wise man, recognized that McKinley had secured a lead over him and accepted the inevitable with such grace as be could muster and twice placed his great rival in nomination for president. Did his own presidential ambition die? By no manner of means. It didn't even sleep. Foraker simply bided his time, which he thinks will be in 1908; but he knows that the chances are ten to one against his nomination in 1908 if Senator Hanna is nominated next year, for two reasons; (1) If Hanna is nominated in 1904 and elected he would want a second term, dead sure, in 1908 and, having the machine, would probably secure a renomination, though he will be past seventy-two on March 4, 1909; (2) even if Hanna did not want a second term the chances would not favor an Ohloan for the succession, and Hanna. having finished his career, would almost certainly use his machine ruthlessly to bar Foraker; hence Joseph Benson, while damning Marcus Alonzo with faint praise, is moving heaven and earth to nominate Roosevelt. He probably reasons it out this way: That if Roosevelt is nominated and elected he will not be a candidate in 1908; that as Hanna will be seventy-one years old Sept. 24, 1908, he would not at that great age be nominated a first time that nearly two terms having then intervened since McKinley's death an Ohio man could aspire to the Republican presidential nomination with some reasonable hope of success, and that, Hanna being out of the running, Foraker would be the Ohio man. All this is well reasoned, provided I have really struck Senator Foraker's train of thought. He is a brilliant man, an eyes fixed on the White House, whose amiable gentleman, one of the ablest Republicans in public life. Personally l like him, and what is here said is not business" with southern delegates. said in an unfriendly spirit. Nobody can blame him for desiring to be president, and nobody can blame him for doing those things which he may do honorably for his own advancement.

and he may win. "Increasing Democratic Hops." Under the above caption, and notwithstanding General Grosvenor's prophecles concerning Republican success. the Washington Post, independent, recently contained this editorial:

Is 1904 going to be a Democratic year? Is the party that has experienced nothing but disaster since 1892 about to achieve a victory? Are that party's woeful defeats in 1894, 1896, 1888, 1900 and 1902 to be followed by the election of its presidential candi-date and the capture of the house of repntatives? Is there any reliable basis for the strong hope, not to say the cheer-ful confidence, with which the Democrats in congress and apparently their political brethren throughout the country are looking forward to 1904? And we may as well ask before exhausting our supply of interrogation points what is the reason for the positive and increasing deficiency of Republican confidence? One encounters this at almost avery turn. It is confessed by Republican statesmen when they indulge in frank talk "not for publication," and the henchmen of those statesmen feel it distressfully.

Bristow's Report.

Since the days of Jonathan and David, to say nothing of Damon and Pythias, there has been no such exhibition of love of one man for another as that of Senator Joseph Benson Foraker for President it to the government by fraud, and carried it to the postoffice, where perhaps some Roosevelt. Brayton, the Rhode Island member of the national committee, comes forward with a revolutionary and reformatory proposition for wailing, gnashing of teeth and a great deal of cussing in several states of our glorious Union. General Brayton's proposition is not new. It has been sprung upon the public before, but has hitherto always been dropped like a to explode at the wrong end. But, as is well known, General Brayton generally carries his nerve with him, and he may be more successful than former expertmenters in the same line. His proposition is this: "Each state, territory and the District of Columbia shall be entitled to four delegates at large (to a national Republican convention) and one for each 10,000 voters or majority fraction thereof casting their ballots for the Republican electors in the preceding presidential election." In other words, he proposes to reduce southern representation in Republican conventions. His proposition will do one thing, a thing about which the general is not thinking-it will unite the Lily Whites and the Black and Tans into the most harmonious body in America. They may fight each other on other questions, such as patronage, for instance, but they will be one as the sea when it comes to fighting General Brayton and his proposition. Wherefore? Because the average southern Republican considers the Republican national convention as his barvest, and he endeavors, usually with success, to make hay while the sun shines. Consequently he will never agree to General Brayton's plan-pever. Nor will divers and sundry very rich Republican statesmen who have their covetous chief source of power and popularity is

It is really refreshing to find a northern Republican paper saying anything It is a great prize he is struggling for, good about the white people of the south. Consequently many persons will read with pleasure mingled with amazement the following editorial which recently appeared in the Philadelphia Inquirer under the above cap-

> It is much to the honor of the south that the most conspicuous example in this country of upholding the right of free speech in seats of learning come from that section. Professor Bassett, author of the article in the Atlantic Monthly in which he said that Booker Washington was the greatest southerner of a century excepting only Robert E. Lee, was sub-jected to so much criticism that he finally resigned. This resignation the trustees decline to accept, the faculty has asked him to remain, and the students have done so, notwithstanding that every member of these bodies is opposed to the particular opinions of the professor as expressed in the article. They units in saying that in spite of their dissent they wish him to remain, not only because he is a competent instructor, but because they believe that the right of free speech is one to be sacredly guarded and that any criticism must be private and indi-
