

THE FRANKLIN TIMES.

AL. A. THOMAS, Editor and Proprietor.

THE COUNTY, THE STATE THE UNION

Published Daily Except on Sundays and Holidays

VOL. XXIV.

LOUISBURG, N. C., FRIDAY, JULY 22, 1904.

NUMBER 12

GRAND DIRECTORY

Sunday School at 9:30 A. M.
Rev. G. B. Hays, Pastor.
Franking at 11 A. M., and 5:15 P. M.
every Sunday.
Prayer meeting Wednesday night,
7:30 P. M.
L. S. Hays, Pastor.

WEDNESDAY
Sunday School at 9:30 A. M.
Thos. B. Wilson, Pastor.
President of U. A. M., and 5:15 P. M.
every Sunday.
Prayer meeting Wednesday night,
7:30 P. M.
L. S. Hays, Pastor.

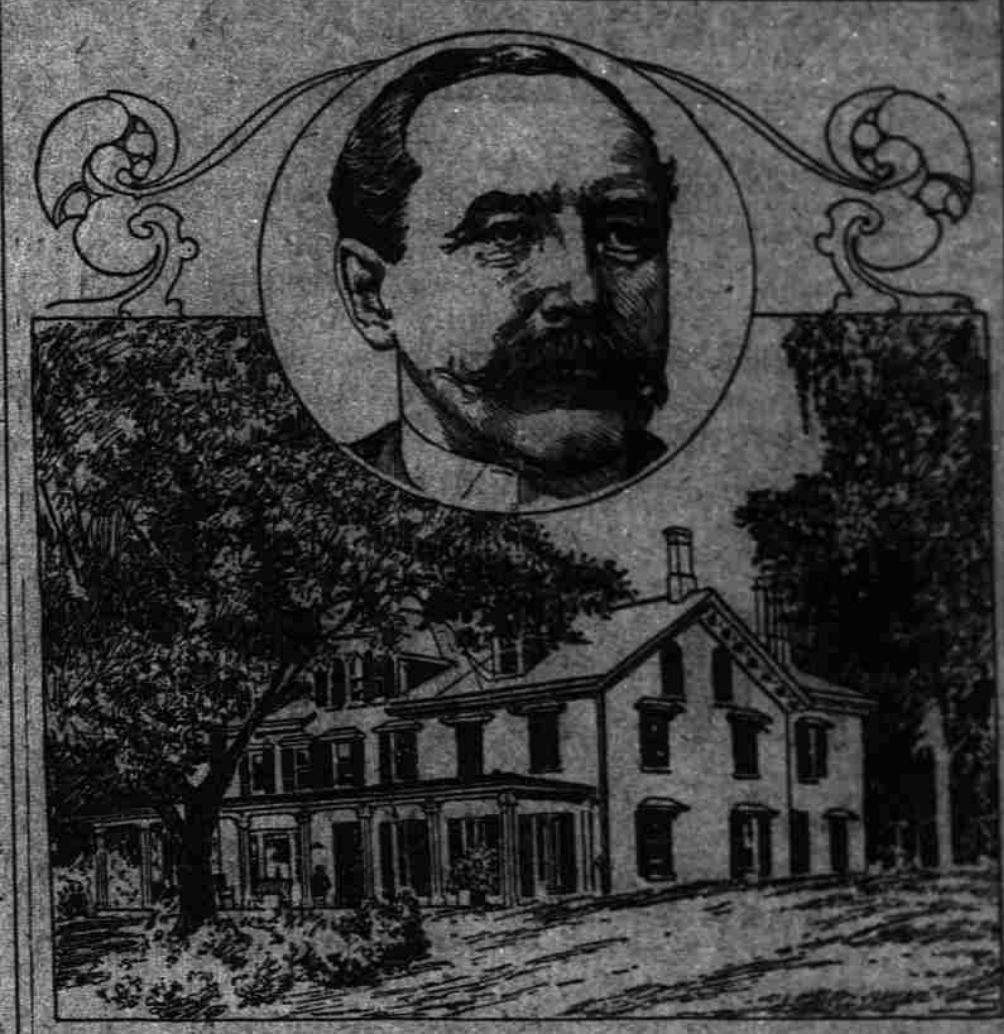

THURSDAY
Sunday School at 9:30 A. M.
Thos. B. Wilson, Pastor.
President of U. A. M., and 5:15 P. M.
every Sunday.
Prayer meeting Wednesday night,
7:30 P. M.
L. S. Hays, Pastor.

FRIDAY
Sunday School at 9:30 A. M.
Thos. B. Wilson, Pastor.
President of U. A. M., and 5:15 P. M.
every Sunday.
Prayer meeting Wednesday night,
7:30 P. M.
L. S. Hays, Pastor.

SATURDAY
Sunday School at 9:30 A. M.
Thos. B. Wilson, Pastor.
President of U. A. M., and 5:15 P. M.
every Sunday.
Prayer meeting Wednesday night,
7:30 P. M.
L. S. Hays, Pastor.

Leon Brooks Parker

ALON BROOKS PARKER, the Democratic candidate for president, is fifty-two years old, six years older than Theodore Roosevelt, and nearly ten years older than his rival when he assumed the presidential authority. He is just a little under six feet in height. He is broad shouldered, deep chested and weighs 160 pounds. His cheeks are ruddy, and his hazel brown eyes sparkle with the glow of health. His hair, which is thin on the top and sprinkled with gray on the sides, is of an unusual but attractive shade of red, characteristic of other members of the Parker family. His moustache, which is usually worn close trimmed, is a shade darker than his hair. Like President Roosevelt, he is an

JUDGE PARKER AND ROSEMONT, HIS HOME AT ESOPUS, N. Y.

"out of doors" man. He keeps his muscles hard and his mind clear and keen by much exercise in the open air, horse-back riding, driving and walking and farm work. He is alert and energetic in his appearance, movements and speech. His manner in association with friends is affable and kindly and without the self assertiveness of the judge. His conversational habit is to be direct and frank and scrupulously careful in his choice of expressions. Usually when his opinion is asked on any subject his reply is instantly ready. Judge Parker is one of the best examples of a self-made man in the United States today. Born poor, he has built up a small fortune that amply provides for his needs, and above that he appears to have no further ambition in a monetary way. His three farms, one at Cortland, another at Accord and the third at Esopus, complete his land possessions, and in all his wealth is estimated at not more than $30,000. Saving and good judgment have brought to him what he has and not any stroke of good fortune. Rosemont, the judge's home at Esopus, is a modest but comfortable wooden structure, standing on the stone foundations of a Dutch house of colonial times. It is set on the side of a hill among shade trees and fronts the river. It is the abode of hospitality and refinement, the typical home of an American gentleman. The picture of Judge Parker was born May 14, 1852, at Cortland, N. Y., and was the son of a farmer. Two hundred years ago his ancestors had come from England and settled in New England. From generation to generation they were of the hardy farmer class, and they drew their love of country from the soil which they had been transplanted. Judge Parker's great-grandfather was a soldier in the ranks of Washington's army. As early as he could do so young Parker attended school at Cortland academy and later got out of the Cortland Normal school all the equipment for life that it could give him. His parents were not able to send him to college or even to take care of him while he was trying to find a foothold. At sixteen he became a country school-teacher. He was obliged to give up the hope of a college training for his profession and to think of the old-fashioned approach to the bar through the office of a preceptor. Having accomplished one cherished ambition, but not his chosen profession, he was admitted to the office of Schoolmaster at Hardenbergh of Kingston as a student of law. Working his way, he was at last enabled to enter the law school at Albany, practicing between the office of his preceptors at Kingston and the law school, according to season and necessity. In 1872 he was graduated, and soon after the sign of Parker & Kenyon was hung out at Kingston. He speedily demonstrated a decided ability for political management. From the start he was a Democrat.

Mrs. LEON B. PARKER turns the books, the furniture, the wide hall and glowing fireplace, the sunny library and the dining room, with its long mahogany table, all show evidences of intelligent tastes that were not developed in one generation. Here Judge Parker walks among his cattle in his boots and pea jacket, the incarnation of strength and virility. He strides through the sorghum and hay fields, visits the great barn, tends the sick cow or fondles the latest calf, and helps his men to clear up the leaves or the stubble. None of his eight farm hands knows half as much as he about the trees, the

Cured of Chronic Diarrhoea After Ten Years of Suffering.
"I wish to say a few words in praise of Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy," says Mrs. Mattie Burge, of Martinsville, Va. "I suffered from chronic diarrhoea for ten years and during that time used various medicines without obtaining permanent relief. Last summer one of my children was taken with cholera, and I procured a bottle of this remedy. Only two doses were required to give her entire relief. I then decided to try the medicine myself and did not use all of one bottle before I was well and diarrhoea never returned. I am now as well as I ever was, and I can say to those who complain of this wonderful medicine. This remedy is for sale by Apocok Drug Co."

Career of the Democratic Candidate for President

ALON BROOKS PARKER, the Democratic candidate for president, is fifty-two years old, six years older than Theodore Roosevelt, and nearly ten years older than his rival when he assumed the presidential authority. He is just a little under six feet in height. He is broad shouldered, deep chested and weighs 160 pounds. His cheeks are ruddy, and his hazel brown eyes sparkle with the glow of health. His hair, which is thin on the top and sprinkled with gray on the sides, is of an unusual but attractive shade of red, characteristic of other members of the Parker family. His moustache, which is usually worn close trimmed, is a shade darker than his hair. Like President Roosevelt, he is an

out of doors man. He keeps his muscles hard and his mind clear and keen by much exercise in the open air, horse-back riding, driving and walking and farm work. He is alert and energetic in his appearance, movements and speech. His manner in association with friends is affable and kindly and without the self assertiveness of the judge. His conversational habit is to be direct and frank and scrupulously careful in his choice of expressions. Usually when his opinion is asked on any subject his reply is instantly ready. Judge Parker is one of the best examples of a self-made man in the United States today. Born poor, he has built up a small fortune that amply provides for his needs, and above that he appears to have no further ambition in a monetary way. His three farms, one at Cortland, another at Accord and the third at Esopus, complete his land possessions, and in all his wealth is estimated at not more than $30,000. Saving and good judgment have brought to him what he has and not any stroke of good fortune. Rosemont, the judge's home at Esopus, is a modest but comfortable wooden structure, standing on the stone foundations of a Dutch house of colonial times. It is set on the side of a hill among shade trees and fronts the river. It is the abode of hospitality and refinement, the typical home of an American gentleman. The picture of Judge Parker was born May 14, 1852, at Cortland, N. Y., and was the son of a farmer. Two hundred years ago his ancestors had come from England and settled in New England. From generation to generation they were of the hardy farmer class, and they drew their love of country from the soil which they had been transplanted. Judge Parker's great-grandfather was a soldier in the ranks of Washington's army. As early as he could do so young Parker attended school at Cortland academy and later got out of the Cortland Normal school all the equipment for life that it could give him. His parents were not able to send him to college or even to take care of him while he was trying to find a foothold. At sixteen he became a country school-teacher. He was obliged to give up the hope of a college training for his profession and to think of the old-fashioned approach to the bar through the office of a preceptor. Having accomplished one cherished ambition, but not his chosen profession, he was admitted to the office of Schoolmaster at Hardenbergh of Kingston as a student of law. Working his way, he was at last enabled to enter the law school at Albany, practicing between the office of his preceptors at Kingston and the law school, according to season and necessity. In 1872 he was graduated, and soon after the sign of Parker & Kenyon was hung out at Kingston. He speedily demonstrated a decided ability for political management. From the start he was a Democrat.

out of doors man. He keeps his muscles hard and his mind clear and keen by much exercise in the open air, horse-back riding, driving and walking and farm work. He is alert and energetic in his appearance, movements and speech. His manner in association with friends is affable and kindly and without the self assertiveness of the judge. His conversational habit is to be direct and frank and scrupulously careful in his choice of expressions. Usually when his opinion is asked on any subject his reply is instantly ready. Judge Parker is one of the best examples of a self-made man in the United States today. Born poor, he has built up a small fortune that amply provides for his needs, and above that he appears to have no further ambition in a monetary way. His three farms, one at Cortland, another at Accord and the third at Esopus, complete his land possessions, and in all his wealth is estimated at not more than $30,000. Saving and good judgment have brought to him what he has and not any stroke of good fortune. Rosemont, the judge's home at Esopus, is a modest but comfortable wooden structure, standing on the stone foundations of a Dutch house of colonial times. It is set on the side of a hill among shade trees and fronts the river. It is the abode of hospitality and refinement, the typical home of an American gentleman. The picture of Judge Parker was born May 14, 1852, at Cortland, N. Y., and was the son of a farmer. Two hundred years ago his ancestors had come from England and settled in New England. From generation to generation they were of the hardy farmer class, and they drew their love of country from the soil which they had been transplanted. Judge Parker's great-grandfather was a soldier in the ranks of Washington's army. As early as he could do so young Parker attended school at Cortland academy and later got out of the Cortland Normal school all the equipment for life that it could give him. His parents were not able to send him to college or even to take care of him while he was trying to find a foothold. At sixteen he became a country school-teacher. He was obliged to give up the hope of a college training for his profession and to think of the old-fashioned approach to the bar through the office of a preceptor. Having accomplished one cherished ambition, but not his chosen profession, he was admitted to the office of Schoolmaster at Hardenbergh of Kingston as a student of law. Working his way, he was at last enabled to enter the law school at Albany, practicing between the office of his preceptors at Kingston and the law school, according to season and necessity. In 1872 he was graduated, and soon after the sign of Parker & Kenyon was hung out at Kingston. He speedily demonstrated a decided ability for political management. From the start he was a Democrat.

out of doors man. He keeps his muscles hard and his mind clear and keen by much exercise in the open air, horse-back riding, driving and walking and farm work. He is alert and energetic in his appearance, movements and speech. His manner in association with friends is affable and kindly and without the self assertiveness of the judge. His conversational habit is to be direct and frank and scrupulously careful in his choice of expressions. Usually when his opinion is asked on any subject his reply is instantly ready. Judge Parker is one of the best examples of a self-made man in the United States today. Born poor, he has built up a small fortune that amply provides for his needs, and above that he appears to have no further ambition in a monetary way. His three farms, one at Cortland, another at Accord and the third at Esopus, complete his land possessions, and in all his wealth is estimated at not more than $30,000. Saving and good judgment have brought to him what he has and not any stroke of good fortune. Rosemont, the judge's home at Esopus, is a modest but comfortable wooden structure, standing on the stone foundations of a Dutch house of colonial times. It is set on the side of a hill among shade trees and fronts the river. It is the abode of hospitality and refinement, the typical home of an American gentleman. The picture of Judge Parker was born May 14, 1852, at Cortland, N. Y., and was the son of a farmer. Two hundred years ago his ancestors had come from England and settled in New England. From generation to generation they were of the hardy farmer class, and they drew their love of country from the soil which they had been transplanted. Judge Parker's great-grandfather was a soldier in the ranks of Washington's army. As early as he could do so young Parker attended school at Cortland academy and later got out of the Cortland Normal school all the equipment for life that it could give him. His parents were not able to send him to college or even to take care of him while he was trying to find a foothold. At sixteen he became a country school-teacher. He was obliged to give up the hope of a college training for his profession and to think of the old-fashioned approach to the bar through the office of a preceptor. Having accomplished one cherished ambition, but not his chosen profession, he was admitted to the office of Schoolmaster at Hardenbergh of Kingston as a student of law. Working his way, he was at last enabled to enter the law school at Albany, practicing between the office of his preceptors at Kingston and the law school, according to season and necessity. In 1872 he was graduated, and soon after the sign of Parker & Kenyon was hung out at Kingston. He speedily demonstrated a decided ability for political management. From the start he was a Democrat.

Cured of Chronic Diarrhoea After Ten Years of Suffering.
"I wish to say a few words in praise of Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy," says Mrs. Mattie Burge, of Martinsville, Va. "I suffered from chronic diarrhoea for ten years and during that time used various medicines without obtaining permanent relief. Last summer one of my children was taken with cholera, and I procured a bottle of this remedy. Only two doses were required to give her entire relief. I then decided to try the medicine myself and did not use all of one bottle before I was well and diarrhoea never returned. I am now as well as I ever was, and I can say to those who complain of this wonderful medicine. This remedy is for sale by Apocok Drug Co."

Champ Clark's Letter

CHAMP CLARK, the Democratic candidate for president, is fifty-two years old, six years older than Theodore Roosevelt, and nearly ten years older than his rival when he assumed the presidential authority. He is just a little under six feet in height. He is broad shouldered, deep chested and weighs 160 pounds. His cheeks are ruddy, and his hazel brown eyes sparkle with the glow of health. His hair, which is thin on the top and sprinkled with gray on the sides, is of an unusual but attractive shade of red, characteristic of other members of the Clark family. His moustache, which is usually worn close trimmed, is a shade darker than his hair. Like President Roosevelt, he is an

out of doors man. He keeps his muscles hard and his mind clear and keen by much exercise in the open air, horse-back riding, driving and walking and farm work. He is alert and energetic in his appearance, movements and speech. His manner in association with friends is affable and kindly and without the self assertiveness of the judge. His conversational habit is to be direct and frank and scrupulously careful in his choice of expressions. Usually when his opinion is asked on any subject his reply is instantly ready. Judge Parker is one of the best examples of a self-made man in the United States today. Born poor, he has built up a small fortune that amply provides for his needs, and above that he appears to have no further ambition in a monetary way. His three farms, one at Cortland, another at Accord and the third at Esopus, complete his land possessions, and in all his wealth is estimated at not more than $30,000. Saving and good judgment have brought to him what he has and not any stroke of good fortune. Rosemont, the judge's home at Esopus, is a modest but comfortable wooden structure, standing on the stone foundations of a Dutch house of colonial times. It is set on the side of a hill among shade trees and fronts the river. It is the abode of hospitality and refinement, the typical home of an American gentleman. The picture of Judge Parker was born May 14, 1852, at Cortland, N. Y., and was the son of a farmer. Two hundred years ago his ancestors had come from England and settled in New England. From generation to generation they were of the hardy farmer class, and they drew their love of country from the soil which they had been transplanted. Judge Parker's great-grandfather was a soldier in the ranks of Washington's army. As early as he could do so young Parker attended school at Cortland academy and later got out of the Cortland Normal school all the equipment for life that it could give him. His parents were not able to send him to college or even to take care of him while he was trying to find a foothold. At sixteen he became a country school-teacher. He was obliged to give up the hope of a college training for his profession and to think of the old-fashioned approach to the bar through the office of a preceptor. Having accomplished one cherished ambition, but not his chosen profession, he was admitted to the office of Schoolmaster at Hardenbergh of Kingston as a student of law. Working his way, he was at last enabled to enter the law school at Albany, practicing between the office of his preceptors at Kingston and the law school, according to season and necessity. In 1872 he was graduated, and soon after the sign of Parker & Kenyon was hung out at Kingston. He speedily demonstrated a decided ability for political management. From the start he was a Democrat.

out of doors man. He keeps his muscles hard and his mind clear and keen by much exercise in the open air, horse-back riding, driving and walking and farm work. He is alert and energetic in his appearance, movements and speech. His manner in association with friends is affable and kindly and without the self assertiveness of the judge. His conversational habit is to be direct and frank and scrupulously careful in his choice of expressions. Usually when his opinion is asked on any subject his reply is instantly ready. Judge Parker is one of the best examples of a self-made man in the United States today. Born poor, he has built up a small fortune that amply provides for his needs, and above that he appears to have no further ambition in a monetary way. His three farms, one at Cortland, another at Accord and the third at Esopus, complete his land possessions, and in all his wealth is estimated at not more than $30,000. Saving and good judgment have brought to him what he has and not any stroke of good fortune. Rosemont, the judge's home at Esopus, is a modest but comfortable wooden structure, standing on the stone foundations of a Dutch house of colonial times. It is set on the side of a hill among shade trees and fronts the river. It is the abode of hospitality and refinement, the typical home of an American gentleman. The picture of Judge Parker was born May 14, 1852, at Cortland, N. Y., and was the son of a farmer. Two hundred years ago his ancestors had come from England and settled in New England. From generation to generation they were of the hardy farmer class, and they drew their love of country from the soil which they had been transplanted. Judge Parker's great-grandfather was a soldier in the ranks of Washington's army. As early as he could do so young Parker attended school at Cortland academy and later got out of the Cortland Normal school all the equipment for life that it could give him. His parents were not able to send him to college or even to take care of him while he was trying to find a foothold. At sixteen he became a country school-teacher. He was obliged to give up the hope of a college training for his profession and to think of the old-fashioned approach to the bar through the office of a preceptor. Having accomplished one cherished ambition, but not his chosen profession, he was admitted to the office of Schoolmaster at Hardenbergh of Kingston as a student of law. Working his way, he was at last enabled to enter the law school at Albany, practicing between the office of his preceptors at Kingston and the law school, according to season and necessity. In 1872 he was graduated, and soon after the sign of Parker & Kenyon was hung out at Kingston. He speedily demonstrated a decided ability for political management. From the start he was a Democrat.

out of doors man. He keeps his muscles hard and his mind clear and keen by much exercise in the open air, horse-back riding, driving and walking and farm work. He is alert and energetic in his appearance, movements and speech. His manner in association with friends is affable and kindly and without the self assertiveness of the judge. His conversational habit is to be direct and frank and scrupulously careful in his choice of expressions. Usually when his opinion is asked on any subject his reply is instantly ready. Judge Parker is one of the best examples of a self-made man in the United States today. Born poor, he has built up a small fortune that amply provides for his needs, and above that he appears to have no further ambition in a monetary way. His three farms, one at Cortland, another at Accord and the third at Esopus, complete his land possessions, and in all his wealth is estimated at not more than $30,000. Saving and good judgment have brought to him what he has and not any stroke of good fortune. Rosemont, the judge's home at Esopus, is a modest but comfortable wooden structure, standing on the stone foundations of a Dutch house of colonial times. It is set on the side of a hill among shade trees and fronts the river. It is the abode of hospitality and refinement, the typical home of an American gentleman. The picture of Judge Parker was born May 14, 1852, at Cortland, N. Y., and was the son of a farmer. Two hundred years ago his ancestors had come from England and settled in New England. From generation to generation they were of the hardy farmer class, and they drew their love of country from the soil which they had been transplanted. Judge Parker's great-grandfather was a soldier in the ranks of Washington's army. As early as he could do so young Parker attended school at Cortland academy and later got out of the Cortland Normal school all the equipment for life that it could give him. His parents were not able to send him to college or even to take care of him while he was trying to find a foothold. At sixteen he became a country school-teacher. He was obliged to give up the hope of a college training for his profession and to think of the old-fashioned approach to the bar through the office of a preceptor. Having accomplished one cherished ambition, but not his chosen profession, he was admitted to the office of Schoolmaster at Hardenbergh of Kingston as a student of law. Working his way, he was at last enabled to enter the law school at Albany, practicing between the office of his preceptors at Kingston and the law school, according to season and necessity. In 1872 he was graduated, and soon after the sign of Parker & Kenyon was hung out at Kingston. He speedily demonstrated a decided ability for political management. From the start he was a Democrat.

Cured of Chronic Diarrhoea After Ten Years of Suffering.
"I wish to say a few words in praise of Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy," says Mrs. Mattie Burge, of Martinsville, Va. "I suffered from chronic diarrhoea for ten years and during that time used various medicines without obtaining permanent relief. Last summer one of my children was taken with cholera, and I procured a bottle of this remedy. Only two doses were required to give her entire relief. I then decided to try the medicine myself and did not use all of one bottle before I was well and diarrhoea never returned. I am now as well as I ever was, and I can say to those who complain of this wonderful medicine. This remedy is for sale by Apocok Drug Co."

"old velvet rye"

pure - old - velvety,
the best for the price,
sold everywhere,
call for it at
Louisburg Dispensary,
Louisburg, N. C.

RESTAURANT

TO SERVE
W. H. MARRIS
SEABOARD
JACOB EVANS
BUY AND BEE BLED
UNIVERSITY
INDUSTRIAL EDUCATION
A. & M. COLLEGE

WHAT IS SAVOY?
Excelsior Coffin Co.
Coffins and Caskets
Robes Bural Shrou and Gloves

Excelsior Coffin Co.
Coffins and Caskets
Robes Bural Shrou and Gloves

Excelsior Coffin Co.
Coffins and Caskets
Robes Bural Shrou and Gloves

Excelsior Coffin Co.
Coffins and Caskets
Robes Bural Shrou and Gloves

Excelsior Coffin Co.
Coffins and Caskets
Robes Bural Shrou and Gloves