It was an experiment of extreme hazard, with the chances in favor of failure. This bad state of affairs grew chiefly out of the icalousy of the states toward each

If an end is not put to the practice of corrupting voters the United States will soon have the evil distinction of possessing the most venal electorate in the world. There is scarcely a "doubtful state" in which there are not large numbers of electors whose ballots are for sale to the highest bidder. It is this class to which fluence upon the little states, and the self. Their votes count for as much as the votes of the wisest and best men in the community. The price paid them for their venality has been steadily rising in successive campaigns. They constitute now a permanently venal class, and their votes have to be reckoned with in every election. The vote of the clergyman, the professional or business man, the student the mechanic, the clerk, the farmer-in teed, of any honest man with convic tions on political issues may be offset by and jealous states and weld them into around and sells it to the purchaser wh a great nation is seldom seen among can afford to pay most for it.

That there is some buying of votes there can be no question, but let us hope that it is not done on such who sale manner as the foregoing Sun editorial would indicate. At one time the selling of votes was the principal feafirst term declining a second election and was only dissuaded from publishing ture of English elections. It is said that one man spent as much as £100 it by the combined efforts of Jefferson, Hamilton and all the leaders of all to buy a seat in the house of commons but in these later days the bad habit But, barring Washington, all the has almost fallen into disuse. King Edward seems to have aroused tome adverse criticism by his determination not to hold court in Scotland and Ireland. His reasoning is that if all he cannot confine such functions to Ireland and Scotland; but must also extend them to the other states of British empire, which would be inconvenient, if not impossible.

Some ill advised newspapers are predicting that Mr. Secretary of State Hay's description of the Demogratic party as "a fortuitous concourse of unrelated prejudices" will live in our vernacular. They are badly mistaken. There is too much of it—the words are too long. If a man wants a designation of a person or party to live and etick, be must make it short, such as "know nothing," etc.
