"But you're going to Mr. Donaldson's tomorrow."

"I am. Well, it'll be fine the next day."

"How long would it take you to get there?" she asked, indicating the post road.

"Well, about ten minutes."

"Well, do it, then, David, and I'll wait."

"No, no. I'm going to see her off to the train. I'll have word for Mrs. Houston to tell Donald Blane, when we're home."

"She's been telling me to leave him."

"Do it yourself, David," she said firmly.

"It's the use of leaving over a ten minutes' job!"

"Well," he said good naturedly, hanging up his coat and throwing aside the apron, "when I come to think of it, I think he's right."

"Now you're having fun!"

"But you're not better in the shop or at the job than in the garden," he persisted.

"I like you anywhere, but especially."

"Hoo d'y mean?"

"Oh, I'm not going to explain—if you can't understand. See! There's Mr. Ogilvy walking to you."

They returned the salutes of the grocer, who stood in his door. "My, but they're the two happy ones!" he sighed as he watched them along the road.

"Poor Mr. Ogilvy!" murmured Mrs. Houston gently.

"Angus," he called as he donned his jacket. "What's wrang wif him?" asked her husband.

"I doubt he's very bad, David," she answered, smiling faintly. "He wants to marry Aunt Wallace."

"Has he no' gotten over that yet? I thought her tongue had cured him lang syne."

"I'm afraid it hasn't—but you're not to speak about such like that."

"Oh, we's a' ken about a' gay shapin' tongue, Jess. I'm no sayin' anythin' aboot her heart, mind!" he added seriously. Then he laughed and inquired, "Dye key why he wants to marry yur aunt, ma dear?"

"He's in love with her, of course."

"That's a sum' hit' o' the reason. He wants to marry her to get her to be his wife."

"Aye," she said brightly, "that's just what I'm workin' for in the kitchen. Just the very thing. Isn't it, David?" she asked, looking around at her husband.

"Don't be stupid!" retorted Mrs. Houston, with affected sternness.

"It's a fact, though. He's got an awfully high opinion o' himself."

"Dye key he's comin' the night after?"

"Aye, he's comin' the night after."

"Aye, he's comin' the night after."
