

VELVETS AND SILKS DEER-
FUL SUBSTITUTES FOR WOOL

Hats of Velvet and Beaver.
New York, September.—What a glorious relief—the arrival of the ever-desirable cool fall days. Thoughts turn most naturally to all the wondrous things that are offered for Indian summer. When the fresh clear breezes are felt brushing gently our sunburned skin, we explore cautiously the rapidly appearing area of new designs, there to find a defiant refutation to the argufying winds and lowered temperature and having acquired our protectorate, laugh in the face of the elements and carry on as usual.

Original New Design

I say "cautiously" must we explore for indeed every little detail of purchase must be of necessity. One can with this or that style. Surely every one has been shocked when upon asking the price of an article found it doubled that of pre-war days. And these conditions will prevail all thru the winter and the government has needed the cooperation of both the manufacturer and consumers.

Capes for Fall.

As a result of the conservation measures, designers have created a variety of cape designs, which were shown in their openings. Their graceful lines appeal to all women and they may be made from a minimum amount of material. One of the smart women seen at an aviation fete not long ago wore a beige duvetyn, the lower edge of which just dripped with heavy silken fringe of a harder shade. The body of the cape was shirred on a deep yoke which extended around the shoulder. The long ends were edged with fringed to correspond with the lower edge.

However, coat suits are vying for favor, and so far are running them a close second. The majority of suits are fur trimmed and the materials are not pure wool. For wool, too, must we give up, not entirely, but that percentage which means the positive victory for democracy. Willing says the modern woman, for she knows only too well the charm of the substitutes. And the substitutes? Velvet and satins. What is there that is more attractive, more absolutely feminine than velvet?

Substitutes for Wool.

The large majority of dresses are developed in these fascinating stuffs and owing to the richness and elegance of these fabrics little trimming is required. Illustrated here are two exceptionally good designs which might well deserve development in the popular materials. The first one is a combination of serge and satin with the touch of worsted embroidery on the panel. The other is an entire satin frock and trimmed with the raging novelty, fringe. Both are smart and simple and would be suitably developed entirely of velvet.

The Revival of Beaver

Hats of beaver are being seen now in all the smart shops. One particularly nice one was a dull old-blue silk velvet faced with beige-colored beaver. The effect was quite stunning as the hat turned up at the side-back and formed a seemingly pert angle.

Satin Successfully Used.

Like the dresses the hats are devoid of trimming and depend entirely on the smartness of their line. The line not what is on the hat, always brands it. A most unusual design has just been imported by a manufacturer from Lancret. The entire tricorne hat is made of moleskin and the highly pointed front is trimmed with a fine flow-ers. What a glorious color scheme, cerise and taupe!

So you see after all we are not so badly off even though it is war times. What a pleasure to be able to give up something for the country. And to think of all the war had taught us! Why at the present time the dye manufacturers have perfected their dyes and now they equal if not excel the importations that we used to depend upon.
