SIDEGLIGHTS OF THE GREAT WEST

After saying goodbye and au revoir to our numerous San Francisco and Berkeley friends, we returned to our Pullmans at Oakland, from which point our trains left for Portland, Oregon at midnight of Aug. 12th. Our party was reduced to about 350, occupying two trains, your scribe being on second section. Our meeting on the train again, after five days separation, was like a happy family gathering and reunion. The genius of the raconteur and the spirit of reminiscence held full sway, the last and better half of our great trip.

The Great West has a monopoly on distances. Los Angeles is the same distance south of San Francisco, as Louisville is from New York City, 480 miles, and the northern boundary as far as Jacksonville, Florida, from Louisville, N. C.—It took us more than twenty hours fast traveling to cross the Northern half of the State. We travelled over the Southern Pacific Railway, on a road of a thousand wonders. The mountains seemed higher, the gorges deeper, the tunnels longer, and the scenery grander than any we had seen.

The mountains near the seashore are relatively higher than the peaks of the Rockies, rising from the table lands, that are from four to six thousand feet above sea level.

All day we were in sight of Mt. Shasta rising 14,444 feet, with a perpetual snow cap above the clouds, that encircled it like a broad hat brim. The great mountain seemed to play hide and seek with us, on account of the many curves and directions of the road we were travelling; sometimes to the right of us, then on the left, sometimes in front, then behind us, and a part of the time lost from view altogether.

Eighteen times we crossed the Sacramento river, and at the Cantara Loop crossed it and curved down it on the opposite side.

For many miles and hours we were in the Sacramento canon, with the mountains looming sky high above us, with heavily timbered slopes. We stopped for an hour at Shasta Springs a place of beauty nestled at the foot of Mt. Shasta, with the Mission Falls from the melting ice cap on the mountain top, and drank its sparkling waters. We passed thru two Loop tunnels in the Shastivon Mountains. Passed Castle Craigs, several peaks of solid rock, that had the appearance of the old Castles of the middle ages. Also Black Butte, named from its color. After crossing the state line, we rested at a siding by the side of a crystal lake 43 miles long. Your scribe with a party of about a dozen went fishing on it at five o'clock a. m. and fished until 7:30, with no luck at all. This Shuswap lake, named as I remarked because it cost the price of a pair of shoes, to fish two hours, from a motor boat that couldn't run under ten miles per hour. We were now in Oregon, saw the Gold Ray Dam on Rogue River, with Table Mountain looking like an immense table, with Mt. Pitt a snow capped peak in the distance.

Ran for some distance in Cow Creek canon and thru its tunnel, and thru Wolf Creek Loop, and arrived at Portland at 10 o'clock, two hours late. We were met at the station by the Portland Bar Association and taken in automobile to Lancaster Park on the Columbia River, 43 miles, where lunch was served, to us as their guests. The Columbia River Drive is one of the finest drives in the world, planned and built by Mr. Lancaster to whom we were all presented at the Park named after him. When I was introduced to him I said "Hello Mr. Lancaster, you are some Franklin County, N. C. stock." He said, "No, that he was born in Tenn. and left there when a boy." I said, "You look exactly like the Franklin County kin, and you didn't inherit any of the earth, you got your part of it soon after you were here." He said, "Won't you take a drink with me." I said, "Now I know you are kin to them." He is justly noted as the leading engineer, and road builder in the great Northwest.

There is no finer road in America than the Columbia River Drive, and the scenery beyond description. With Mt. St. Helena across the river in the State of Washington, Mt. Hood, 11,225 feet high, the highest mountain in the state, both snow capped. With big trees several hundred feet high, some of the cedars fifty feet in circumference.

Over bridges, thru tunnels, and around bluffs so steep that it would make one's head dizzy, to look downward, with every few minutes a new and novel scene, kaleidoscopic in its changes. We stopped en route and enjoyed the various points of interest.

Mitchell's Point Tunnel 400 feet thru the bluff. Montezuma Falls 620 feet high. Latonville Falls 225 feet high. Bridal Veil Falls 372 feet high. Wah- Kee-No Falls several hundred feet high, and Metlako Falls and Devil's Punch Bowl in Eagle Creek.

One of the chief points of interest was the Vista House built of white marble on a high bluff overlooking Columbia river, giving a view of the great river and the towering mountains on each side, that can be seen from no other point.

A notable company gathered around this festive luncheon. It seemed that all the Judges in the State of Oregon were present, and many of them were introduced to me as Democrats. We were entertained during lunch by music from a Scotch Bagpipe Band with the Scotch dances on a stage in the open park. The Highland Fling and Fisher's Hornpipe were among the many stunts for our amusement. After lunch your scribe was kodaked astride a donkey, as "a DemberRt in the Emblem."

We were taken back to Portland and driven over its beautiful residential streets and boulevards. We had up to this time seen no prettier city than Portland, with miles and miles of stately homes, set back from the street, with banks of the most magnificent flowers and roses ever seen, rivalling and surpassing the mythical hanging gardens of ancient Babylon. For perfection of coloring, and profusion of flowering growth, your scribe saw nothing in California to equal the beauty of the Portland homes and their flower fronts.

Portland is a great city, situated on the Willamette river, claiming a population of 200,000, and increasing faster than they can count, has its sky scrapers and fine hotels, and bids fair to have a million in a few years. We were struck by the culture and attainments of its Bar, numbering 400, most of whom we met, their strong and splendid personality, and their open handed and unlimited hospitality. We see the strong impressive characteristic of the Scandinavian, the sturdy Scotchman, and the homelike faces of the reliable Englishmen, not so many of the Irish brogue and visage, as most of them stopped to run the bars and politics of the eastern cities. But since the advent of Volsteadism, they too will soon join the endless throng, that are seeking homes and happiness in the golden sunsets of the Pacific slope.
