THE TOOL TO USE FOR LATE FLOWING

Raleigh, July 13.—The best tool with which to cultivate corn and cotton late in the season is a scrape or a sweep fitted with wings that will shave the ground one or two inches below the surface.

Such an implement does not run deep enough to cut the roots but thoroughly pulverizes the surface, leaving an excellent mulch. It also cuts the weeds squarely off. The common hoe or shovel is apt to go too deep for late cultivation, and also will often run around a weed instead of cutting it.

In parts of the Coastal Plain, a wide sweep attached to an ordinary plow stock is used by many farmers. This kind of sweep, commonly known as a heel sweep or buzzard wing, is usually eighteen to thirty inches wide.

"This wide buzzard wing would be unsuitable in the Piedmont region on rolling land," says E. C. Blair, Extension Agronomist at State College. "It makes one furrow in each middle, which would collect all the water falling in that middle, and would cause washing. In the section around Raleigh small sweeps of the same design as the buzzard wing are used on ordinary riding and walking cultivators. These plows are usually eight to twelve inches wide. Their shaving action is the same as with very wide sweeps, and they overlap so that the entire surface of the soil is worked. Six or eight small furrows are made in each middle instead of a single large one; so that there is little chance for enough water to collect to cause serious washing."

Mr. Blair states that some sweeps are made somewhat similar to the ones mentioned; but, are heavier, and so constructed that the point gouges into the soil. The right kind of sweep is made so that its point runs very little deeper than the wings.

Piedmont farmers are urged by Mr. Blair to try small sweeps. They are excellent for weeds such as cow-itch and maypop.
