Dr. Frank Crane Says

The Right Kind of Patriotism

A patriotic deed is one that reflects honor and glory upon ones country. We recognize General Grant, the Duke of Wellington and Napoleon as patriots because they led armed forces of their respective countries. The exploits of Colonel Lindbergh together with that of Chamberlin and Levine, have glorified the United States. But this glory was not offset by any rancor occurred by other countries. France and Germany were just as enthusiastic in acclaiming the exploits of our heroes as we were. This is the right kind of patriotism and patriotic action, for it is one which exalts one's native country and at the same time does not awaken animosity in other peoples. Undoubtedly Thomas Edison has glorified his own country quite as much as General Grant. On a vote taken in France recently the most popular Frenchman was found to be not Napoleon, but Louis Pasteur. So Darwin and Jenner have done more to exalt the prestige of England Drake and Wellington. Koch and Goethe have spread the fame of Germany far more than Von Nitke and Ludenburg, and Marconi and Belaucha have made Italy famous and are entitled to the gratitude of their country quite as much as Garibaldi. Tolstoy has done more to spread the renown of Russia than all her warriors. This throws a welcome light on true patriotism which is found in that harmless rivalry of achievement by the members of various national groups. There is no bad blood in this competition. There is nothing gained for one country which is not equally valuable for the whole world. We are learning that to be a good national is to be a good world citizen, and the applause of mankind is quite as valuable as the applause of one's fellow citizens. In order to elevate our country and to magnify it, it is no longer necessary to go out and kill somebody to annex some other territory; it is better to do something that shall excite both the emulation and the applause of the whole world. True patriotism consists in making our country stronger and better and not necessarily belittling another country.
