MAIL-ORDER COMPARISON SALE

Sometime ago a few of the business men of a small town in Indiana got together to discuss the advisability of organizing a Commercial Club and working together more closely for the good of the town and community.

The result of this meeting was the organization of a Commercial Club that has done more for the good of the town and its people in the short time it has been in operation than had been done before in ten years.

When the merchants got together and talked things over they found that they had a great deal in common and that "the other fellow" was really a "good fellow" after all.

Today every live business man in this town is a booster for the Commercial Club and is working to build up the town and to interest the farmers.

The first constructive work undertaken by the new organization was the "Community Public Sale," which was handled through the Commercial Club. Of this event one of the farmers had to say:

"The finest thing the merchants ever did for us was to start the Community Sale. They hired a good auctioneer and advertised for us to bring anything we wanted to sell to town on a certain day and it would be sold at auction for a cost of two per cent of the amount realized. I had a horse and a piece of machinery that I wanted to sell and this gave me just the chance I needed, for I did not have enough stuff to make a sale of my own. My stuff sold at a good price and I was glad to give the Commercial Club two per cent for selling it for me.

"There was a big crowd in town and a lot of goods changed hands. More than $7,000 worth of stock, machinery and household furniture was sold. The merchants added some stuff to the sale to spice it up a little. They put in sewing machines, rugs, etc., and that gave us a chance to buy some new merchandise, too.

"If the merchants keep on doing things like this we will be glad they got together and quit fighting each other the way they use to do."

For some time the merchants of this town had realized that mail order houses were taking considerable business out of their trade territory, but they hesitated, individually, to come out in the open and go after this sort of competition. After the organization of the Commercial Club, they became imbued with the belief that they could accomplish something worth while if they would work together and each offer merchandise in direct competition with catalog goods.

So the druggist, implement, hardware, furniture, jewelry and general store proprietors got together and selected catalog merchandise that they could duplicate in quality and price and got up an attractive advertisement.

In all of this work the merchants were ably assisted by the editor of the local paper who is loyal to the town, so much so in fact that he will not accept advertisements from out of town concerns in spite of the fact that this policy costs him heavily in revenue.

The merchants are liberal advertisers so that the paper is well supported and consequently is not forced to seek business away from home as is the case with some country papers in towns where the merchants have not learned the value of advertising regularly in the local paper.

During the Comparison sale a farmer said: "I was going to buy a rug of a catalog house this week; but I saw the rug offered by one of our merchants and I bought the rug at home. If the merchants will give us as good values as we can get by sending away we will trade at home. It looks to me as if the merchants are going to do some good by getting together and advertising this way."

"It is a whole lot better to see the goods than to buy from a catalog," said another farmer, "but when I can save a few dollars by sending away I'm going to do it. When the merchants started their Public Sale they started something that is of benefit to all of us and now if they are going to sell goods here as cheap as the mail order houses, why we will be glad to trade at home.

"Why don't they invite us to join their Commercial Club and let us have a part in the work if they want to build up the town and community? We are just as much interested in the town as town folks are interested in us, and probably a whole lot more.

"This sale they have on this week is a good one and if the merchants do this sort of thing right along we will probably be able to buy our goods here just as cheap as we can get them anywhere."

Merchants who have been in business in this town many years say that there is a better and more friendly feeling among the business men now than ever before. They all admit that life is more worth living and they all show an interest in the success of each individual business in the town.

MORE WORNY PEACHES -- UNLESS TREES SPRAYED

Raleigh, June 10—With prospects of a short crop of peaches in the principal producing regions this year and with the peach curculio more abundant, it will be a good time to do some careful spraying this season.

"Peach growers are warned that this year and unless the regular spray or dust schedule is carried out, there will likely be considerable wormy fruit," says C. H. Brannon, extension entomologist at State College. "It will pay, also, to pick up and destroy the drops from infested trees. This is about as important as spraying or dusting. The drops can be buried several feet beneath the soil so that the curculio beetle cannot escape."

Mr. Brannon, along with others interested in the peach industry of this State, believes that the growers have prospects for better prices this season and he says that this will make it the more important to follow the regular spraying or dusting schedules. For those who do not know the curculio, he explains that it is a pesky beetle which lays an egg in the peach. The egg hatches into a worm which develops in the peach and then, after dropping to the ground, changes into the adult beetle in the soil. This beetle then emerges from the soil and continues the attacks on the fruit.

For those who would like to have more detailed information about the curculio or other peach insects, Mr. Brannon will be glad to have them write to him and he will send such information as needed. Mr. Brannon can be reached at State College Station, Raleigh.
