CERTIFIED SEED ARE FROM RELIABLE GROWERS

Crop seeds offered growers as being one or two years from the breeder are not always kept up to the high standard required by the North Carolina Crop Improvement Association and when such seed are not certified, they are likely to prove a disappointment.

"A good example of this was given this spring when certain barley and oat crops were inspected," says Gordon K. Middleton, seed specialist at State College. "The fields were found to be badly infested with wild onions and the oats showed considerable varietal mixture due to a volunteer crop from a preceding planting. The grower did not realize that such a condition existed but when told that the seed could not be certified, he replied that he would advertise them as one year from the breeder. He reminded the inspector that his cotton seed was refused certification last year but that he had no difficulty in disposing of his surplus seed."

Another grower, says Middleton, had a different experience. This man produced and sold 600 bushels of fine certified wheat last year. He did not get a complaint and those who bought from him wanted more. Some regretted that they had bought only enough for a seed patch. This man rendered a service to his community and was proud of his accomplishment.

The first man, who sold mixed seed, was helping to hold down the crop improvement work in his community. Certification does not make the seed any better but does establish their reliability and given two growers with seed from the same breeder, the man whose crop passes all certification tests, certainly has the best seed. Mr. Middleton finds that alert farmers are now demanding improved seed and are asking that these be from reliable sources. Those men whose crops pass the certification tests might sell their seed at a slightly higher price but the results more than pay for this charge, he says.

Skilling has been known in Norway as a means of travel since ancient times, but it became a sport only about sixty years ago.

Two Currituck County pastures planted with the same seed mixture at the same time show a remarkable difference in stand and growth due to the application of 300 pounds per acre of phosphate on one of them.
