Timely Farm Questions
Answered at State College

QUESTION: Is it advisable to use a self feeder for hogs all the time?

ANSWER: The self feeder is the most economical method for allowing the animals to balance their ration and should be used as much as possible. The only exception is when the brood sows are dry. At that time the sows should be fed by hand. A good pasture should be provided and the animals fed a protein supplement with enough corn added to keep the sows gaining in flesh. A mineral mixture should also be supplied at all times. From the time the pigs are two weeks old the sows should be put on the self feeder again and allowed to select their own rations.

QUESTION: When should cockerels be caponized in order to be ready for the high market?

ANSWER: Since the greatest demand for these birds is in January, February, and March it is necessary that they be caponized early enough to grow out by that time. It usually requires from eight to eleven months to finish capons properly and the caponizing should be done in June and July so as to finish out for the market demand. Birds weighing from one and one-half to two pounds should be used. Although larger birds may be used, the operation is much more difficult and the beneficial effects on growth and flesh quality are much more than on the smaller and younger birds.

QUESTION: What precautions should be taken in installing a home water system?

ANSWER: The first item to consider is equipment and material. Always get the best possible. Galvanized pipe and fittings should always be used as rust in ordinary black iron pipe is objectionable. The pump should be located in a light, well ventilated place where it is accessible for repairs and adjustments. Suction pipes should have a uniform slope to avoid pockets and reduce the number of fittings. These lines should also be as short as possible to reduce priming trouble. The Agricultural Engineer at State College will answer any further questions and will assist in the installation if requested.

NON-POLITICAL FARM RELIEF

The farm problem is essentially a problem of increasing agriculture's cash income. Government has been wrestling with that problem for many years. It has passed scores of farm relief bills. And every one of them has been more or less a failure.

Today, among thinking farmers, the value of agricultural legislation is being heavily discounted. Such legislation is necessarily transitory. It is the product, often, of political ideals dominated by special interests. And the result is that the farmer is looking less to Washington for aid—and more to his own organizations.

The growth of the cooperative marketing organizations furnishes evidence of this. They have grown remarkably in membership—and, even more important, they have grown in influence. They are gradually increasing agriculture's income by using sound business principles as their tools—something political farm relief has failed to do.

DESTROY THE WEEDS

Weeds in pastures compete with desirable pasture grasses and legumes just as weeds in cultivated land compete with row crops, according to William E. Adams, Assistant Agronomist, of the Soil Conservation Service in the Tar River Soil Conservation District, near Franklinton, N. C.

Mowing pastures when they begin to get weedy will help to control weeds by preventing the re-seeding of annuals and by weakening the perennial weeds through exhaustion of the root reserves, Adams pointed out.

In almost every old pasture there are some areas that have not been grazed where the grass has become tough and unpalatable. Mowing will clip the tough grass and stimulate the development of new, tender growth which will result in more uniform grazing. It will also tend to develop a thick turf, which resists erosion and aids in moisture conservation.

Many new pastures seeded this spring contain only a few weeds, which can be destroyed by pulling or digging them up. The same method can be used on rough and inaccessible areas. While this is more laborious than mowing, it destroys weeds much more thoroughly.

Elimination of weeds that compete with desirable pasture plants for food and moisture is one phase of more efficient land use which many farmers overlook, but it is an operation that will pay good returns for the labor involved because of the improved grazing and the development of a more desirable sod from an erosion-control standpoint, Adams said.

An increasing number of Yancey County farm families are installing running water in their homes this year, says R. H. Crouse, assistant farm agent.
