an evening with Aunt Dinah

Remember Aunt Dinah's quilting party? A hundred years ago, it was an important social event. In those days, when people needed things, those needs became the focus of concerted community action. Neighbors used each others' needs as opportunities to strengthen the community. This was democratic cooperation in action, and it's a heritage we wouldn't want to lose.

People like Aunt Dinah are still with us. The farmers of North Carolina proved that in the 1930s when they joined together to take the risks and obligations of rural electrification upon themselves. In the teeth of statements that rural electrification was unfeasible, not needed and an impossible task, the farmers did the job—and created a market for billions of dollars worth of electrical equipment.

Now these rural people own and operate their own electric systems. Their accomplishments are another example of the benefits of democratic cooperation.
