Electric co-op members buy $20 million worth of appliances each year in North Carolina.

Dollars saved by non-profit operation are spent in local stores.

Local banks benefit through operations of local electric co-ops.

Electricity is a forerunner of other rural home improvements.

Helping make the cash register ring.

Main Street benefits when rural areas are growing.

More farming income means more money for equipment.

Electricity saves costly labor.

rural electric co-ops: making the cash register ring

You don't have to be a farmer to share in the benefits of rural electrification. Directly or indirectly, every person and business in North Carolina benefits because 210,000 Tarheel families share ownership and control of North Carolina's 33 rural electric co-ops.

Electricity means more efficient farming, which brings more money in the farmer's pocket -- money which finds its way into local shops and stores. And non-profit co-op operations -- through low rates and capital credit refunds -- add dollars to community income.

Dependable, low-cost electric service from electric co-ops has made rural locations more attractive to both factory workers and home builders. Doctors, merchants, salesmen, factory workers and factory builders are moving in under power lines built by farmers.

Growing electric co-ops mean growing rural areas -- growth which helps make the cash registers ring on Main Street.
