Sized To Suit

When a gardener wishes sheets of blue in his garden in spring-time his thoughts turn to hyacinths, for these bulbs produce blooms of the true blues that neither daffodils nor tulips possess. Furthermore, by including grape hyacinths, which are really Muscari and not related to true hyacinths, it is possible for him to have lower sheets of the same blue.

Either hyacinths or grape hyacinths grow with straight, erect stems which makes them particularly useful for mass plantings--along either side of a path, in a flower bed or in groups here and there in a perennial border.

Grape hyacinths may be used for underplanting such taller-growing bulbs as daffodils or tulips, for some species bloom with each of these bulbs. Or they may be used among rocks or under trees in an area which becomes too shaded for bloom later in the season.

Hyacinths, since they have longer stems and much larger flower spikes, are especially effective when planted with shrubs, such as flowering almonds, which bloom at the same time. They also may be planted with perennials like creeping phlox.

While the blue-flowered varieties of both of these bulbs are most popular, other colors are available. Hyacinths also bloom in white, pink, cream and pale apricot. Grape hyacinths flower in white and purple-blue as well as blue.

Bulbs of both of these plants should be purchased and set out in autumn for spring bloom. Grape hyacinth bulbs are small; may be planted any time from mid-September to early November; and should be set so that the bottoms of the bulbs are 3 inches under the soil surface.

Hyacinth bulbs should be planted a little later, from mid-October on, and holes dug for them should be 6 inches deep.

fresher food...

and more of it - for less with

RURAL ELECTRICITY

Electricity helps the American farmer to raise and care for more livestock, hatch more chickens, milk more cows and keep food fresh and clean. The end result is fresher, more economical food on everyone's table.

Today's wage-earner spends less of his work-week providing food for his family than any other man ever before in the entire history of civilization. And his family is better fed than any in the world - thanks in a large part to rural electrification.

We are proud of the role we have been able to play in the electrification of our portion of rural America... and we continue to meet the ever-increasing demand for more and better electric service.
