

Houses for Birds

successful houses for birds follows:

1. Do not make the entrance hole too large.
2. Do not place entrance hole near the bottom of the house, except for martins. Generally, the entrance should be in the upper third or the front.
3. Do not place houses too close together because birds preempt a territory and vigorously defend it from intruders. Spacing houses at least 30 feet apart is generally suitable.
4. Do not leave old nest in box as this reduces the chance of parasites, disease, and house wear.
5. Do not use tin cans because summer sun will heat the bird and cook them alive.
6. When erecting boxes on the trunk of a tree, fasten them loosely well down below the branches and foliage and remember birds like sunlight.
7. Boxes may be suspended by wire from low branches and this discourages molest-

It is time of the year that our beautiful birds are beginning to look for a place to set up housekeeping. The Louisburg Garden Club, The Perennial High School Gardeners and The Gay Gardeners Junior Garden Club is asking all of you to put out boxes for our feather friends.

Houses for birds are built to supplement the lack of good nesting sites in many areas, to bring birds closer to us for observation, study and pleasure, and to encourage birds not to nest in places that may be unsuitable for their welfare.

There are many species of birds which will set-up house-keeping in boxes and shelters provided for their use. The limiting factor in making a house suitable for a particular bird is the size of the entrance hole.

9. Ventilation makes a house more comfortable. A hole or two or slits under the roof on the sides will help change the air.
10. A house, to be thoroughly practical, should be built so that it can readily be opened. A removable roof, hinged front or floor, or sliding floor will serve this purpose.
11. Use cat guards on trees, but better still get rid of your cats.

Midcalf is the length favored for late afternoon clothes by one designer. Others have skirt lengths down about the ankle with ruffles laces and blousy sleeves.

With longer skirts heels on shoes are a bit higher but not of the spike variety.
