Thunderstorms Produce More Power Than A-Bomb

National Geographic News Bulletin

Washington — It often rains "upside down" in the sudden fury of a summer thunderstorm.

Strong updrafts may roar up at 60 miles an hour and carry raindrops high into the air before the water droplets grow heavy and plummet to earth.

So violent are the updrafts and downdrafts within the storm system that they can toss an airplane hundreds of feet in seconds, flip it over, or even rip off its wings.

An average summer storm produces 50 times the energy of the first atomic bomb, the National Geographic Society says.

Triggers Hailstones

The storm may release a hundred thousand tons of rain and hailstones as big as grapefruit. The pelting hail flattens crops, splinters buildings, smashes glass, and kills animals, birds, livestock, and sometimes men. A hailstorm that struck Wichita, Kansas, in 1951 caused property damage in excess of $14 million.

Paradoxically, violent storms also produce valuable fertilizer. Lightning frees nitrogen from the air, and rain washes it into the soil at the rate of a hundred million tons a year.

About 1,800 thunderstorms rage around the world at any given moment. The west coast has the fewest thunderstorms of any area in the United States — an average of less than five a year. The greatest number — some 90 — strike a strip in Florida extending northeastward from Tampa Bay to Daytona Beach.

For all its power, a thunderstorm begins as a column of gently rising air — warm, moist, and walled by a chimney of cooler air. It is topped by a cottony cumulus cloud.

Such a thunderstorm

Laced with Lightning

Massive charges of electricity form inside the thundercloud. Negatively and positively charged centers polarize within a thunderhead. Eventually, an electrical discharge flashes from one center to another or between one and the ground. This is lightning.

The shock wave, as the lightning bolt expands along its length, is thunder. Because sound travels at about a thousand feet a second, the number of seconds between the flash and the thunder, multiplied by one thousand, tells roughly the distance between an observer and the storm.

A single flash of lightning seldom drains a storm cloud of its electrical energy. Repeated strokes down the same channel are common, and dozens of bolts can occur in one second. The old saying that lightning never strikes twice in the same place is false.
