Port Of Call

By Edward H. Sims

One of the traditions in crossing the Atlantic by air is night flying, especially east-bound. I have never felt that a night flight, even in the first-class section, could really amount to first-class travel when the passenger sits up through the night. Yet the great majority of crossings from New York and other cities depart this country at seven or eight in the evening. If the idea is to give the working man a chance to do a day's work on this side of the ocean and do the next day's in Europe, it makes sense in one way. But first-class passengers often don't adhere to such rush schedules. And after paying several hundred dollars more for first-class accommodations, what they really get is a seat with enough room to stretch out in, better care by stewardesses and a lavish meal with plenty of wine and cocktails. But one must still sit up all night and get off the plane next morning in the suit he slept in! That isn't first-class care by any of the old standards of travel. The new Boeing giant may provide passengers the first truly first-class air service in years. Later versions will carry up to 490 passengers. The first, which Pan American will get in December, will carry about a hundred fewer passengers. There is enough space aboard one of the giants to provide passengers private rooms with beds. It will be interesting to see what the various airlines offer passengers in various first-class configurations. Last month I returned from Germany on Pan Am's 073 flight from Frankfurt, departing Germany at 2:30 p.m. This is a reasonably good time to take off west-bound for one is in the States by five p.m. But earlier take-offs would be even more convenient for it is good to arrive in the States early enough to make a good connection and get to one's home by five or six for to the passenger returning from Europe five or six really is ten or eleven p.m.
