The chair ruled all such moported, "the democrats, amid great excitement, demanded that the clerk cal the roll on the question of adjournment The president tried to drown the voice of the clerk with his gavel, but the roll was called, twenty-six members voting for adjournment. The democratic members started out while the clerk handed the roll call to the president to be an uounced. That official tore it in several pieces and threw it on the floor, while he crowd surged in front of the rail was laid over his limb to aid in picking a warm welcome-from at least one out the large tuberosity of the bone below the hip-joint. The location being definitely fixed. Dr. Roberts took his scalpel and made an incision through the flesh about three inches wide, laying bare the hip-bone. A fine drill was attached to the electro-osteotome, and the electric current from the battery sent it whizzing in an instant through to the head of the hip-bone, about four inches pieces of bone in its passage, and, the drill being withdrawn, they were put under a microscope. Dr. Eliot, after a minute examination, decided that they were discased. He was now ready to proceed still further with the operation. He used a larger drill and then a still larger one, and the electric current as quickly drove them through the bone until there was a hole in the young usn's hip-bone big enough to put your finger in. The blood was absorbed by sponges every few moments, and the hole was cleaned out as much as possible by introducing little sponges into it. At this point occurred the most fascinating piece of work, from a medical point of view, that was involved in the operation. Dr. Roberts held in his hand a tiny electric light, its glass globule no SUME larger than a pea and its carbon filament PROM. 1', as fine as a hair and so tender in its construction that it could bear a current from the battery only for an instant at a time. This light the doctor introduced inside the young man's bone, and as it was "flashed up" at a few seconds' interval, he was able to see just what portions of the bone were healthy and what were diseased. The light made the interior as clear to the ordinary eye as if it were laid open on the dissecting table: The doctors were delighted with its utility. Then Dr. Roberts rapidly cut away all those portions which were diseased, by means of the electro-osteotome. Having obtained satisfactory results from the operation, at this state a drainage tube was placed inside of the bone to carry away any diseased matter that might form and the remainder of the wound was nearly all sewed up. Antiseptic bandages were applied and a hypodermic injection of morphine was made in the invalia's right leg to help him through when he should regain conshousness. His senses came to him soon after and his condition was all that could be desired. The hollow in the bone will
