The assaults upon civil service re2 form continue, and it looks as if systematic attacks are to be made all along the line. Senator Vance handled it without gloves this afternoon, mixing really more ridicule than argument in his remarks, and probably for the reason that as a shrewd politician he is well aware that the former is more effective On both sides of the chamber there was chuckling over his remarks, and when he had finished several Senators expressed themselves sotto voce as agreeing entirely with what he said. Both, the Republican and Democratic Senators when they call at the White House take every opportunity to give civil service reform Bly but not the less vigorous digs. It is well assured, however, that up to date they have made no apparent impression on the President, who invariably meets them with the assurance that he has no reason to doubt that the people heartily approve of his policy, whether the politicians do or not.
