After the annual meeting of the directors of one of the national banks was concluded and the stockholders, directors and officers all were rejoicing in the sense of faithful discharge of duty and fat delicious dividends, Mr. McAden, in a hospitable way entirely his own, announced that there was a dividend in the back room to be parselled out which was a reward to the inner man for the fasts that weekly meetings had often rendered compulsory on the busy directors. While discussing the business of the city generally the conversation drifted to the lack of factories of all sorts in sufficient numbers to vary the interests of the community and to give continuous and steady trade. One director, well known for his character, wealth and learning, was beginning a jeremiad when he was stopped by the practical and solving question,

Why don't you put some of your monoy in a cotton mill, Judge? They pay here and hereabouts. I'll put in $10,000 if you will, said the plucky udge. Done, said his doughty friend. There was $20,000. Perhaps there are some other gentlemen present who are not too bashful to do good and to distribute, said the irresistible Mr. McAden, and there were. Before the doors closed on the retiring capitalists there was $85,000 pledged by men good for that amount with an 0 added. There was work for a hundred men, masons and carpenters; work for a hundred women, boys and girls; and work for the subscribers to make it successful and by economy and care to keep it as a wage mine for honest workers of Charlotte. The capitalists felt that they had done an unselfish and patriotic but thoroughly business-like day's work. The working people saw

This begins the year well for Charlotte. Can't Raleigh do as well? It is not necessary to go exclusively into cotton. The manufacture of the raw material of whatever kind that we have accessible and that can be carried to markets
