This rather dramatic crime passed off without particular notice, the papers giving it only a brief paragraph. This afternoon, however, a discovery was made which was even more horrible than any of the recent deeds.

A few days ago the right arm of woman was found by some boys in the Thames near Waterloo Bridge. It belonged to a young woman, plump, shapely and graceful, and had een rudely hacked from the shoulder. It was believed at first to be evidence of another murder, but as no young woman had been murdered so far as known, the theory that it was a specimen from a dissecting room was generally adopted. Last week, however, another arm, corresponding with it, was found in a yard behind the asylum in Southwark, half a mile from Waterloo Bridge. The police took immediate possession of it, and refused absolutely either to give any information concerning its appearance, lor to say whether it pointed to a fresh crime. The boys who found it said it was a well-preserved human arm, scarred and excoriated in many places, as if from the action of quicklime. The police refused to say yes or no to this, but hinted or said that it was an arm with no flesh on it. This afternoon, however, a discovery was made in Pimlico, a mile up the river from where the arm was found, which throws some light on the mystery. There are some old buildings on the embankment, close to the Parliament House, and almost in the shadow of Westminster Abbey, and workmen are engaged in tearing these down to prepare a site for the new police station. As they destroyed new police station. As they destroyed an old vult today they came upon a shapeless mass, which, upon inspec-tion, proved to be the trunk of the body of a young woman, perhaps 30 years old. The horribly mutilated head, arms, and legs had been eat body of a young woman, perhaps 30 years old. The horribly mutilated head, arms, and legs had been est off and carried away, only the trank being left. The body was not ripped, however, as in the Whitechapel cases. It was very much decomposed, and in fact must have been there many weeks. The police removed it to mortuary, and tomorrow morning the doctors will adjust the arms beside it, to see if they fit. It is now admitted by the police that the second arm found matched the first one. Should the arms belong to the body they may serve as a clue. They seem in a much better state of preservation than the body, however, and, should they not fit, they will stand as evidence of second horrible crime yet unrevealed There is no clue to the identity of the murdered woman; in fact so many people disappear daily in this great city that the record of disappearances will not be of much assistance. This crime, single or double as it may be, has no connection with the Whitechapel murders. Its method is different in every possible respect, and should it prove to be two murders instead of one it will show an independent operation of the Whitechapel nature. Pimlico is two miles from Whitechapel. The master mur-derer of the latter district has done all his work in one small area, and there is no clue whatever to him.
