THE BALLOON A FAILURE. The cotton balloon was filled with 400,000 feet of gas on Friday last and bursted, nearly suffocating a crowd on the lee side. Thus ends the experiment with a cotton balloon. Extracts from Our Washington Letter o September 11, 1873.

While the grangers are fighting the railroad monopolies and working up a great and important problem in civilization, it would be well for them to consider some important facts in regard to their own status of production. The census shows that one fifth of the population of the great corn and wheat region of the North-west are engaged in agriculture, yet their industry is mostly confined to those in cereals, and to the production of beef and pork. Therefore they are unburdened with food products, the money value of which depends upon the demands of a distant market. The railroad monopolies find both temptation and opportunity in the necessi ties of transportation. However, nature, according to its present principles, can scarcely be expected to withstand this temptation. Would it not be far better to engage a portion of the capital and labor employed in this great surplus cereal production in the production of other agricultural staples-sugar beets, for instance !

The revolution in the world's production and exchange is indicated by some significant facts lately transpiring. Among these is the order of a Liv erpool firm upon a Pennsylvania iron establishment for one hundred tons of merchant bar-iron. We have hitherto been dependent upon England for our supplies of this metal, so important to our industrial and commercial interests. That dependence is now a thing of the past, and the case is being rapidly reversed. When once an iron interest is being necessary to good government thoroughly organized we can dispense with a protective tariff, and that question will be at rest.

The Agricultural Department has received from Coffee county, Tennnessee, a specimen of the German millet, lately introduced in that locality. It produces from two to four tons per acre, and is much relished by all kinds of livestock. It produces an entire revo lution in the grass culture of that re gion, and meets an especial want of the Southern States. It appears that the agricultural industry of those States is becoming more diversified each year and that wealth and prosperity are proportionately on the increase.
