Thursday, March 13th, 1873.

THE editorial correspondence, descriptive of Washington incidents after the inaugural ceremonies, was unaccountably delayed until too late for publication.

It is sometimes amusing to see the straits to which discontented office seekers and other disappointed searchers of gain, are sometimes put to, to find fault with some public man. Of course the President comes in for the heaviest share, and the howl over every act of his life, is as astounding as the tortuous in this respect than the editor of the New York Sun, who seems to have devoted his life to talse charges and soon as one charge has been circulated, denied and utterly exploded, the Sun starts off on another report, and after putting its powers of invention to a very severe test, the bantling is forced out with such a show that some people actually believe it.

able and highly sensational sheet, we find the leading article to be a criticism on President Grant, for approving the bill which increased his salary. The Sun claims that when the President was elected to office last November, that he then entered into a contract with the people to perform the duties for $25,000 per annum, and that by accepting more he was violating his contract ! Now we are of those who believe in a strict adherence to the sacredness of a contract. We have often spoken on that point, and do not care at this time to elaborate it, as the question that first arises is, where is the contract. If the President's election is to be considered in the light of a contract, it naturally follows that its terms are prescribed by law, and are to be regulated accordingly, so that if the laws under which the President was elected prescribe a method for the adjustment of his compensation, it follows that they can be changed, higher or lower, without his consent. No one doubts the authority of Congress to increase the salary of the President, if so disposed, but we believe it cannot be changed during the continuance or term of the holder. At any rate it cannot be lowered. Now if the laws permit the. salary to be changed, and a man is elected to hold the office, does he not agree to conform to the laws and rules regulating it? We think he does, and it was on those terms that he was elected.

There is another phase of the question, however, which seems to have escaped the attention of the grambling editor, and that is, that Grant was not the President for the term to which the salary applied at the time of signing the act. Although he had been elected, he had no more authority in the premises than though some other man had been chosen for that position, and the approval or disapproval of the act in question became his duty as President of the United States On the 4th inst., Gen. Grant was inaugurated and became the President of the United States for his second term, and under the new law, is to receive the salary of $50,000 per annum. This has no more connection with his past term of office, than if another individual had been chosen for that term, and baving taken the oath of office, is now carrying out that contract. He had not "signed articles" until the day of his inauguration, and now, being under coutract, he will be expected to perform his portion, and the country will do likewise.

It will be a home institution and we doubt not a successful one.

The bank will be opened at an early day, as early as the necessary books, furniture and location can be secured.

We can confidently recommend this bank to our friends. We urge upon all classes the importance of saving their money. The aggregate of small savings becomes a large capital, and, well invested at home, its pays twofold.

Cant. Notwithstanding the confusion of tongues incredent to the building of the tower of Babel, there is no speech or language in which cant is not heard.

Let us consider for a moment the cant which insinuates itself into our everyday walk and conversation. How many hands we grasp in a friendly way, which we would rather not take hold of at all, were it not that common courtesy de mands hypocritical pretense of an interest we are far from feeling. How often in writing, do we address some one as "dear so and so?"-thereby degrading the title the heart involuntarily bestows No man shows a greater ingenuity upon its nearest and best be oved ones. until it has bec me so common that many persons consider it a form of address which politeness absolutely requires, and which may mean anything growling abuse of the President. As or nothing, according to circumstances. This lack of sincerity is manifest more, perhaps, among women in their daily intercourse with one another than among men. Their greetings upon corners and in street cars sometimes furnish an indifferent spectator food for mirth, and if of a cynical disposition, grounds for somewhat of contempt. The lips which five minutes previous were moving to and fro in tree citicism of Mrs. Brown, or Jones, or Robinson, wreathe themselves into sweet smiles on the appearance of either or all of the ladies in question, and only too often are presenter in the form of an apparently affectionate kiss, thereby reminding us of holy writ, for Judas, if we mistake not, was also given to kissing; although in these latter days, now that men have repounced the custom among themselves it seems hard that women should take

In our social intercourse the chance visitor has become so accustomed to the conventional "I am so glad to see you," that the phrase is no longer satisfactory evidence that we are welcome. Even if disinclined to see us, our hostess, instead of sending word that she is engaged or indisposed, will, in nine cases out of ten, loll back in her easy chair with an unblushing assurance that she is "not at home," and the servant trans mits the message, and society consider the falsehood an act of courtesy, and the lady who was guilty of it a "pink of politeness." There are some of us who inwardly rebel against such civil incivility; who act our part, if it comes within our line of duty so to act, with an inward pro test and an earnest prayer that in some tuture state we may find ourselves among a people who say what they think and mean what they say.

There is another form of cant which is in a degree less objectionable than the above, because there may be a par ticle of self-delusion to make the falsepess less deliberate: The old form in which the "pot calls the kettle black;" the habit of denouncing some certain custom or folly to which we are by nature averse, while we cling to others which are just as evil in themselves, although we do not perceive it. We all know that it is wrong to drink, we all know it is a positive sin and mighity, but even if we do partake too freely of the flowing bowl it will not restrain our depraved appetite to be harangued on the subject by a temperance lecturer whose mouth overflows with the uncleanness of tobacco; for a man who cannot control his own appetite has no right to caution others. And if it be tobacco that has grown upon us until its use is a continual habit, we do not care to hear any moralizing on the sub-ject from one whose pleasantest pasttime is a little game of cards, "just for tun, you know." Let us have an eye to our own weakness, for too often we

The New York papers speak of Miss Faithfull's admirable lecture on "The Best Society" as an earnest plea for fine culture, noble thinking, and unselfish, useful living. She urged women in particular to study hard, to know something well, and to master things as well as books, and books for the sake of things.

Rev. Mr. Hammond approached an Iowa man and asked him if he was a Christian. "No," replied the other party, "I am a railroad man." "Well," said Mr. Hammond, "I know of several conductors in New England that are Christians." "That may work down East all right, but a man can't be both in Iowa," responded the employe.
