A Freak of Nature—Wondrous Effects of Indian Turpin.—A Remarkable Bearded Boy Developed Like a Man.

Washington county, Ind., has a wonderful case in the person of a boy not three years of age. From a gentleman who recently visited the house of the father of the boy, and saw him with his own eyes, we learn the following particulars: James Williams, a well-to-do farmer, who resides twelve miles east by south of Salem, has a boy who will be three years old on the 11th of October next. The child is very healthy, and well formed in every respect, except his weight is seventy-five pounds, a little above the average.

When about one year of age this child began to develop rapidly, and now presents the appearance of a man. Upon the face are long black whiskers and moustache of remarkably thrifty growth and fineness of texture. The back and breast of the child are covered with silken black hair from two to three inches in length.

The child has good health and is very intelligent. The face wears as thoughtful an expression as that of a man of mature years, and is withal quite handsome, were it not that the cheeks puff out too much, thereby detracting from its beauty. Our informant says he never saw such a wonderful sight in his life, and states that those who live near Mr. Williams and see the child almost daily yet look upon the little one in perfect amazement.

In making inquiry as to how this freak of nature was accounted for, the mother of the child stated that when he was in his first year he got hold of an Indian turpin and eat it up. This vegetable is a very powerful astringent, and the physician in attendance at the time is said to have worked a whole day to counteract its influence. From this time the child commenced the development now accomplished, and to this Indian turpin is attributed the result above described.

As we are not skilled in materia medica, we do not give an opinion, although what Indian turpin had to do with this case we cannot conceive. The parents of the child, we learn, were to have exhibited it at Salem yesterday.—E.
