LETTER V .-- COAL AND PLUMBAGO. To Charles Fisher, esq. Secretary of the Rowan Agricultural Society. Sir-Fossil COAL is so little used, or even known, in this state, that probably many of our inhabitants will need to be told, that we refer to a combustible substance, found in the interior of the earth, and existing there in such abundance, as to furnish to most old and populous countries the greatest part of their fuel. This substance is of such value to England, that without it she would be utterly unable to carry on her manufacturing operations: indeed without it, she could hardly supply herself with fuel for the ordinary purposes of life. The following facts will show both how abindantly coal exists in nature, and what vast use is made of it in certain countries. One of the greatest coal formations known, is that of New-Castle in the north of England. This has already been worked for severa: hundred years, and still it is estimated, that the formation contains enough to last 100 years longer, atthough not less than 72,000.000 bushels are carried from it annually. London alone requires for her monthly suppy 2,376.000 businessi (Annais of philosophy 4, 411.)

Owing to the abundant resources for fuel afforded by our interminable forests, the United States have no. hisherto employed Fossil Coal, except on a very limited scale. But the forests embraced within the older states, are by no means inexhaustible; every year they are bowing before the axe, and already have our more populous districts begun to feel the scarcity and expensiveness of fuel. As our country becomes more thickly settled, and our forests more extensively cleared, a resort to subterranean supplies for fuel will every day become more and more common. In several places already, where large manufacturing establishments have made great destruction of the surrounding 1 rests, coal has become indispensable to their progress. In the most populous parts of the
