Cherokee Editor Attends Indian Journalism Meet
Gwen Owle, Managing Editor of the CHEROKEE ONE FEATHER, attended a meeting of editors of Indian Newspapers across the nation to plan a national conference for Indian journalists.

director of American Indian Development in Denver, sponsor of the planning session.

Trimble told the conference he hopes a national Indian news service can be established through the coming national conference to service the nearly 200 Indian newspapers published in the nation today.

Most of these, said Rubert Costa, editor of the INDIAN HISTORIAN, San Francisco, are written by Indians. However, he said, Indian writers need to be trained to produce more technically competent papers.

Costa said Indians must be in top editorial positions to express "valid Indian views." He said most textbooks, articles and movies present false views about American Indians to the public.

Indian newspapers, the editor said, "present many points of view and are supported in various ways - some by tribal councils, some by foundation grants and some by subscriptions and advertising."

The oldest editor attending the conference was Mrs. Marie Potts, 75, Sacramento, who has been publishing a paper for 20 years - Federated Indians of California SMOKE SIGNALS. She travels throughout California teaching traditional Indian customs to Indian and white students.
