She knew that she had given him her first affection, and that heart could never beat in unison with another's, a sorrow such as she had never known befere, h a d entered her heart, and stolen its happiness. No woman had ever loved man with more devotion than she had loved him. And this love she felt had made her more worthy her womanhood. Though the last tie which bound them was broken, she knew that Paul Ash- ley still loved her, and is was only a fancy of love for the vain butterfly of fashion that had lured him on—and would be repented of when too late. She could never think evil of Paul. Shereflected upon it for hours, know- ing that she had lost a heart that her gentle influence could have made worthy, knowing that now she must work on in the dark aided by no lov- ing hand; but her heart should be strong, the bright vision of the future and what might have been, should make her happy no longer. She would	den away there, and there too were some garments that would just fit her. Mrr. Vane told ar she must put them on, asked her it she næded any assistance. "No thank you," was all she could say; then she left her alone saying tea would soon be ready. Claudia looked around bewildered.— Was it all a mocking dream, cr was it Heaven f And then she sank down on the floor and prayed; it was a prayer of real thanksgiving. Then she washed her face and brushed out the long bright curls, and "arrayed them one by one as no one else could do, and laid aside her taded things for neat tasteful clothing; then she looked in the mir- tor. What a graceful figure met her view, the damp tresses of hair were pushed back from a brow soft, and snowy white the dark lashes and a strange charm in the large eyes, when the light and the tears came together and a laint flush had gathered over the white tace,—the domestic that opened the	made a Mr. Roush give her name tour hundred times repeated because he re- fused to give her his name, according to sundry yows and onths.
