I was sitting on our front piazza the other day, when I saw adjoining farm to my father's. His mother was owned by a tiny little Scotch woman of the class known as "old maids", and this is the way in which she became a slave owner: She carded and spun, and wove with her own hands $100 worth of home-spun cloth, which she sold, and converted the money into a little negro girl, aged 6 years, whom she raised to maturity, and who both parties should be sure that and joy, are bidding farewell to eventually became the mother of Scotch woman thought too much of them to have them work, and although she owned good lands, they were idle, and shiftless, and entirely non-supporting, and the Scotch owner found she had "an elephant" on her hands; but she would not hire them out to work, ble neighbors, while her colored marriage you wish she was. and she was fed by her charitahunted and fished for the balance. But they were kind to their little old Mistress, and the woman whom she raised was faithful in ministering to her on a lingering bed of sickness and death. Many times I was sent, when a little girl, by my dear mother to carry a basket of food to the tiny old lady. I loved to go, because she was so kind, and always gave me such a warm welcome.
