SAVING HABIT IS GROWING.

People of North Carolina Are Putting More Money in Bank—Deposits Increase 57 Per Cent in 2 Years. Raleigh News and Observer.

Notwithstanding the fact that the people of North Carolina invested more than $110,800,000 in Liberty Bonds of the first four issues and gave tremendous sums outright to the various forms of war work and relief, deposits in North Carolina banks increased fifty-seven per cent during the two years of January 1, 1917, to January 1, 1919.

These record breaking deposits have been reported by the banks of North Carolina to the Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond, the amount of money current, or circulating accounts and in saving deposits being far in excess of anything ever before experienced in the history of banking in the State. Comparative figures just completed, show that from January 1, 1917, to January 1, 1919, the total volume of the deposits in the North Carolina banks increased more than $72,040,000.

One of the features of the reports filed by the banks is the remarkable increase shown in savings deposits. This is not by any means confined to North Carolina but is true of the banks throughout the Fifth Federal Reserve District and, indeed, all over the United States. In North Carolina the amount of money to the credit of savings accounts increased more than $14,703,000 within the period given above, or 32.85 per cent. There are 537 banks in the Old North State. The figures here given are based upon the official reports filed by 369. In the Fifth Federal Reserve District, 1,563 of the 2,047 banks reporting, total deposits show an increase of $438,950,000 or 43.33 per cent, and in the same period the savings deposits increased 32.87 per cent of $127,631,000.

More Wages and More Saving.

While many factors, bankers agree, contributed to this condition, there are two principal reasons, it is declared, for the general phenomenal increase in deposits. One of course, is the increased wage which workers received during the war period, this putting an immense volume of money into circulation. The other—and this is considered far more important—is that the people in America began to learn for the first time that they could save regularly and systematically. The millions of dollars in the banks. When the fifth loan—the Victory Loan—was offered and subscribed the volume of savings suffered but little, if any, this issue also being paid for out of the current earnings of the public which had thoroughly schooled itself in this method of financing the government.

Including the Victory Loan, North Carolina subscribed $138,095,400 to the intervening walls, shoots upward a hundred feet and seems to float in the smoky air. Only for a moment, it paused, then pointing its nose almost straight upward, it springs forward in a spiral climb, until it is but a glittering atom among the clouds.

The watchers wait breathlessly, a brilliant sword of light pierces a filmy cloud, flashes a second and lights among the dry grass and debris just without the wall. Follows a wisp of smoke, then a blaze shoots upward. It is Allison's au revoir, thus shall it be with the ammunition dumps of the Boche, thus will the steel helmet of the Kaiser's troops burn the heads of its wearers.

M. Gevrol turns to his friend with a glowing face.

"A great day, Monsieur Clemenceau, your work and mine will succeed."

THE WHITE FALCON

A Story of the World War.

BY A. P. MITCHELL.

CHAPTER VIII.

Flight of the Falcon.

It was in darkness for a brief period, then a light flashed along the hall, and in a moment five gendarmes rush into the room.

"After them," Pitou cried, and they began hurriedly to search the house. Margot, von Linden and their companions had disappeared.

Leaving the police to their search, Pitou turned to Allison. "Come, we must get to the Chateau as quickly as possible, if we would save M. Gevrol's machine."

Hurrying down stairs, Pitou soon found an auto and the party hurriedly entered. Soon they were speeding through the outskirts of the city and shortly afterward the turrets of the chateau came into view against the darkened sky.

As the car drew up at the entrance, Pitou asked Allison to see the two women inside and then rejoin him. When he had done so, Pitou struck off through the woods to the rear of the chateau at a fast pace until they were in a direct line with the shed containing the plane, then paused.

"I have here a letter written by Margot to Berlin, that in case they should fail in obtaining the plane in exchange for the girl, the shed would be blown up. I have figured that von Linden, who was deputed to take the machine across France to Germany, and his emissaries, will attempt the bombing of the shed tonight, since they have lost Mdlle Clemenceau's letter states that they have tunneled underground, and so can accomplish their object without risk. They want the machine, but would rather destroy than let France have it."

Allison's head is in a whirl of conflicting thoughts. It seems so unreal, these kaleidoscopic changes that have taken place since the early afternoon of the day before. What a maze of intricate happenings have enmeshed him since he had accepted the post of piloting the great white flyer.

In a few minutes they are joined by the gendarmes, who have been instructed by Pitou to follow after reaching the house.

Pitou sends them to what he judges to be posts of vantage. Allison's watch shows him that it is three o'clock, when footsteps are heard approaching cautiously. Presently they see several shadowy forms slipping through the trees. Three of these stop at a large tree some thirty feet from where Allison and Pitou are standing. One of them stoops and brushes away the leaves. When he straightens up, he brings a door with him. It is there evidently that the tunnel begins.

At a sign from Pitou the police close in on them. In a moment the three men are in irons. But Pitou gives an exclamation of disappointment as he peers into the face of each. Von Linden is not among them. The leader is free. Pitou slips away in the direction from which the men had come. Presently a shot is heard, followed by the cracking and breaking of limbs, then silence. What has occurred, no one can tell.

After waiting a brief period, Allison and the police with the three prisoners make their way toward the chateau.

At the edge of the road they find Pitou.

"Von Linden has escaped," he explained.

Two days later, in the early morning, those of the chateau have gathered on the wall to watch the White Falcon take its departure. Even M. Clemenceau has been wheeled outside. M. Gevrol and Allison are in the shed making arrangements.

There is a great whirring as the propellers make their first revolutions. The giant glistening birdlike machine rises slowly into view from behind
