Possessin' first han' knowledge, I take my pen in han' To tell a few things folks should know about the farmer man;

An' somethin' about farmin', what ain't found in the books-How the farmers occupation is some harder than it looks; How he takes the risks the season bring, with frosts. an' storms, an' drought

Compelled to leave to Providence the way he's to come out; The one thing certain he must work to raise his crops an' stock, Diggin' on from dawn till dark-he can't go by the clock-Knowin' all the time that things which no one con control May happen jist most any time to put him in a hole.

He battles with the moles an' bugs, an' forms of life so small That, without a microscope, he can't see them at all; He must fight things invisible; he only knows they're there All around about him, on the ground an' in the air; An' while he fights what he can't see, he's busy as the bees Combattin' forty-'leven different kinds of enemies That come from all directions, with the same thought, every one To make a livin' off him, like the bugs an' things have done-He's been cheated so an' lied to by so many seekin' pelf That he doubts what he is hearin' when he's talkin' to himself. The business man should change all this-an' I am glad to say That business people everywhere are drivin' thataway, That they're workin' with the farmer as they come to understan' How his success an' their success must needs go han' in han'. That their industries, the world aroun' are sure to rise or fall Accordin' to the kind of farmin' that supports 'em all. Dependin' on the farmer's trade, it's good business, by jings, To help him make more money with which to buy more things. Also when he produces more, an' town folks come to buy,

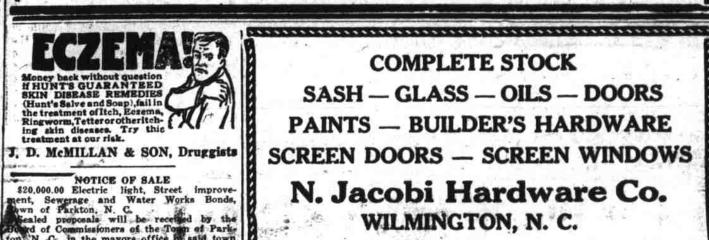

Whey he'll make more on volume, an' their grub won't come so high .- From Farming-The Business Magazine.
