It is common enough indeed, espemotly throng. Altogether the day was cially in the mouth of the average politiquite a revival of old customs, and really cian to hear platitudes about the power of the Press, but do they or we truly realize that power? If we did thus realize it would we not strive more earnestly to prepare ourselves for its conscientions exercise? We ought never to forget that we have in our hands greater power to do greater good for the State than any other body of men in it.

Another thing that Press Conventions do, carrying us about as they do into different sections of the State, is to give us a much needed knowledge of their several wants and needs, a knowledge that is absolutely essential to an intelligent exercise of our calling. It is meet, therefore, that we should gather here from the mountains to the sea-shore, to enjoy our brief-holiday from the consuming cares of our calling. Indeed the large number of our profession that I see before me inspires me with fresh hope and renewed confidence in the homes and from your presses did you not have a love for your profession and a pride in i.s membership. Another omen of good import is the presence here of our young friends of the Amateur Press Association.
