WASHINGTON, D. C., Jan. 1, 1881. To-day's New Year calls, in Washington, were a repetition of a familiar programme. The President, Cabinet Officers. Judges of the Supreme Court--nearly everybody, official and non-official, received them; but calls were less numerous than usual, because of the intensely disagrecable weather. New Year receptions at the Capitol are good, if for no other purpose, to display the imposing reserve strength of the army and navy. It has been the policy of our government to bring chiefs of Indian tribes to the large Eastern cities, in order to impress them with the strength of our population, the extent of our resources, and the hopelessness of their cause in the irrepressible conflict. This policy has had no apparent effect upon Indian wars, because the savage is unable to distinguish those who have been taught French and waltzing, to qualify them for their executioners, and the shop-keepers and dandies who prominade Pennsylvania Avenue. The accomplished "pups of war" from West Point, and the exquisite civilian, look precisely alike when the former are masquerading in citizen's dress, as is their custom for three hundred and sixty-four days of the year.
