Untimely Words.

A frightened child is to be soothed not scolded. Any rebukes which i deserves are not to be given while it is almost wild with terror. A despondent man needs, for the hour, words of cheer not words of merited reproof. A clergyman who valued highly his loving wife's criticism upon his words and manner in the pulpit, asked her not to tell him what she had noticed out of the way, when he was fresh from his exhausting service; but to say all the encouraging words she could to begin with; saving the list of blunders until he had recovered sufficient nervous force to meet bravely their disheartening array. If a husband would find fault with his wife, or a wife with a husband, let it never, never be done before others. A rebuke under such circumstances is always untimely. To do it fittingly at any time requires wisdom, tact, and grace. If an author shows you a new book of his, or an artist invites you to look at his latest paintings, do not first pleasant words you can of the work before you, and then, unless you have something else, unless there is some time-"is wise."
