

Herd's Grass.

For hay alone this grass ranks next to timothy. The soil best suited to it is moist, swamp land. It will grow almost in running water. It yields a valuable return on thinner land than perhaps, any other of the cultivated grasses. Its chief requisite seems to be moisture. There are large bodies of pipe-clay land at the South which produce nothing but oats, which will make fair Herd's grass meadows. Of course the richer the land the greater the yield. The hay is good in quality, and sometimes very large in quantity. The grass should be cut just as the seed begins to ripen, and before the stalk has changed its color. Sow a peck of seed to the acre.

Timothy and Herd's grass should be sowed together, as they are ready for the scythe at the same time. This mixture is better than either grass singly. The timothy will be some eighteen inches taller than the Herd's grass, and the mixture of the two will give a heavy cutting close to the ground.—Howard's Manual of Grasses.

The true idea of farm life is to build up a comfortable home, not a temporary stopping place for a year or five years, or until it can be sold. It is next to impossible for a man to put the same zeal and thoughtful, painstaking work upon a farm that he intends to sell and leave as he does upon one that he intends to be his and his family's, so long as they are on it.—The Southerner.
