DANISH BARQUE RIALTO,

On Voyage from Wilmington, N. C., Towards Trieste, Austria.

Monday, Jan. 18, 1884. Lat. 36° 34' N., Lon. 8° 13' W. Last night at 8 o'clock we saw the first glimmer of the lights of Europe. It was the bright gleam from the light-house on Cape San Vincent, South-west extremity of Portugal. In connection with our sighting this welcome beacon there was given a striking example of the wonderful exactitude at which the science of chronometrical horology has arrived. After tea the officers were gathered around the saloon table engaged in "working out" the solar altitudes taken in connection with the chronometer for obtaining the ship's longitude. That work being completed we proceeded to make out our position on the chart and one of the officers remarked that according to the results we were at that moment only two minutes of arc from the radius of Cape San Vincent light. Hardly had he uttered the words when "Light on the port bow!" came ringing down from the look out in the fore top. Between our real position and that assigned to us by chronometer there was a difference of only one second of time, equal to fifteen seconds of arc or one quarter of a mile. Our chronometer was set with Greenwich time last September and has been neither rated nor compared since. At dawn the land was plainly visible. This "dawn," by the way, was a splendid example of cosmic fraud, not at all like the species which is held out to the credulous public as an inducement to this super-extolled region, but a miserable hybrid affair, a cross between a London fog and a Scotch mist. The vista was not one to cause a person to rush into a stream of rhetorical enthusiasm. In fact there is a strong family resemblance between Portugal and her exiled offspring—the Azores. The country is neither mountainous nor level, but covered with a kind of knobs, resembling somewhat one of our Eastern sand flats sprinkled over with Gorgonzola hay-stacks. Unlike her less fortunate children, however, Portugal abundantly makes up in historical association all that she lacks in picturesque attraction. You forget her undeniable homeliness in listening to the wonderful tale of her ancient grandeur and proud conquests which she wags to your entranced ear on the whispering land breeze. On this very spot one hundred and seven years ago on Valentine's morn when love lorn maids and amorous youths filled the land with "yummy" effusions, and the wrath and burden of the postman alike waxed heavy, a very unmarriageable scene was transpiring. Mars had profaned Cupid's Sabbath, and Madame Britannia stern matron was at her accustomed occupation of endeavoring to convince the skeptical Frenchmen that she was the only and original mistress of the seas. Here was that doughty old sea dog, Sir John Jervis, whose undisputed contempt for ye foolish Frenchmen was so great, busily engaged in the agreeable task of eradicating political errors after the old theory which treated heresies and heretics as inseparable propositions and therefore to be exterminated alike. Very fatigued indeed did the Frenchmen become with Sir Johns red hot arguments and very much mutilated did they get with his comical persuasions on that memorable lover's anniversary. Many a sturdy Briton and gallant Gaul went down that fateful day into the unknown depths, united in the dread fellowship of death, that mighty warrior who knows neither Briton nor Gaul, neither Goth nor Roman, but whose enemy is all mankind, and whose battle field is the world. Some years after that, Admiral Rodney and a cargo or two of Spaniards had a difference of opinion about Gibraltar, on the same spot, during which argument the Angel of Death claimed the majority of the Iberians. It has been a long time since this trifling little country, along whose shores we are now gliding has played more than a "snipe's" part in the great drama of Europe, and of late she has been satisfied with a seat in the pea-nut gallery. Far different was it with Lusitania when Emmanuel the fortunate held sway over the realm. 'Twas then "The voice of Enterprise spoke from Sagre's tower," and the heart of the daring young Vasco de Gama echoed to her call. Then flourished the gallant Camoens, at once soldier, sailor, poet and excited adventurer. Those were the days of Gomey, of Carterel, of Cabrillo and of a thousand other fearless spirits and ocean knights. The very names of the Portuguese explorers and navigators of that awakened epoch would fill a book. Then the "Portugee" was a stirring individual and spread himself over the face of the earth, exterminating and converting, pirating and exploring, swapping the Scriptures for slaves, transporting a cargo of Jesuits and religion to Africa and a cargo of 'niggers' and misery back again, and carrying the insane gable of Portuguese tongues and the vile odor of Portuguese garlic into the remotest regions of the globe. The Portuguese Pericles is dead now. Enterprise grown hoary from unheeded adjectives no longer "speaks from Sagre's tower." The 'Portugee' having abandoned the search for El Dorado about the same time that he abjured the use of soap and water looks back upon both, with the contempt of superior enlightenment, as vain dreams of a romantic epoch. The people having rented their country and coasts out to England for a battlefield went to sleep as one man and at latest accounts this nation of sleeping beauties was still slumbering. The "Great Allied European Circus" with a decidedly novel attraction called Carlo III arrived in the somnolent realm on its way to Spain and set up its show in several Portuguese villages but it did not seem to take well with the Lusians, so it went to Spain. There the novelty drew in a manner that exceeded the wildest expectations of the managers. It attracted an immense amount of attention. In a little village called Brihuega it drew the attention of a gentleman named Duke Vendome who attended the performance and brought such a crowd of his friends along that the proprietors were seriously inconvenienced, so he embarked that a good many of them never got over it. The survivors tore up a good deal of Portuguese territory in their frantic attempts to get over it, and remarked when they had regained the sea-coast that they had brought out a Carlo III, but he had proved to be a carrot too before they got through with him. In spite of all the surrounding hilarity the lazy Lusians slept on. The earthquake came along that way scooped in a quantity of them, and jolted up the survivors; Napoleon arrived on the scene and stirred them up in his character of fairy prince, but the sleeping beauties only grunted, said an expletive and snored again. I will wager that if we were to land at any one of the little white sepulchral villages past which we are now sailing we would find five men and ten dogs asleep to every hundred square feet of sunshine. The remainder of the population would probably be slumbering in the shade. Just on our port bow lies the lovely little city of Lucas de Barmada. Up there on the brow of that gently sloping hill, bristling with fortifications and long lines of glaring white barracks, lies a spot of emerald green upon which the eye loves to rest from the gleam and glare of the intensely white buildings. Here it was that Ferdinand de Soto, three hundred years ago, mustered his brave band of adventurers, the flower of Spanish chivalry, with Portuguese glittering in burnished armor, and Castillians "very gallant, with silk upon silk." Upon the steps of you aged, gray cathedral, whose tapering spire towers above the surrounding foliage of olive and cork trees, stood the venerable "padre" when he invoked the blessing of Heaven on the devoted band who carried a cross to erect on the banks of the Father of Waters, and manacles for prospective slaves. From that lovely land-locked bay, rippling in the sunlight, they sailed, the most of them never to return. Far away, across the fertile valley of the Guadalquivir, a few white spots are barely discernible, gleaming amid the luxuriant vineyards. These charmingly situated villas are the outposts of the town of Palos—a name which deserves the eternal remembrance of Americans, for from this place departed the intrepid mariner who gave them their land.
