The valley between Dillo mountain range on the east and the Mauney mountain range on the west can be known by the general name of Flat creek valley, though Cedar creek also flows through it. In what we will call No. IV of these series this valley is termed a synclinal one, yet the slate of the country is both synclinal and auticlinal, for the general dip of the slates from Dillo is west, while that from Mauney is east. Flat creek and Cedar creek flowing into the river in an almost parallel easterly course has a divide, and this divide is made by the auticlinal dips of the slate, and along the backbone of this divide, the slate is nearly vertical. Here also, the most prominent veins of quartz appear and it will be readily perceived that neither the backbone or the veins keep the line of the water course, but are crossed by them, for beginning at or about the mouth of Cedar creek, we intersect a bold vein on D. C. Reid's land. It crosses Cedar creek just above its mouth on its S. W. course, passes through Mrs. Park's land, on to that of J. Love Morgan's. Here it is intercepted by a cross course and is thrown considerably out of its line, in fact it is cut in two, and some 100 feet further east it passes the cross course and then resumes its course. It is then cut on Mr. Calvin Wyatt's land by a 42x6 foot (in the clear of timber) shaft, 60 feet deep. This shaft is full of water now, but from output, it can be seen that the gangue of the casket: C. H. Miller, C. J.
