MIZPAH.

We never used the word while thou and I Walked close together in life's working way: There was no need for it, when hand and eye Might meet, content and faithful, every day. But now, with anguish from a stricken heart. But now, with anguish from a stricken heart. Mispah! I ery: the Lord keep watch between Thy life and mine, that death hath riven apart; Thy life beyond the swful vail, unseen. And my poor broken being, which must glide Through ways familiar to us both, till death Shall of a surety. Red me to thy side, Beyond the chance and change of mortal breath.

Mispah: yes, love, in all my bitter pain, Litrust God keepsth watch betwirt us twain.

The lips are dumb from which I used to hear Strong words of counsel, tender words of praise; Poor I must go my way without the cheer And sunshine of thy presence all my days. But God keeps watch my ways and days upon, On all I do, on all I bear for thee. My work is left me, though my mate is gone; A solemn trust hath love beque thed to me.

A solemn trust mith hove beque thed to me. I take the task thy languid hand laid down That summer evening, for mine own alway; And may the Giver of both cross and crown Pronounce me faithful at our meeting day! Mizpah the word gives comfort to my pain; I know God keepeth watch betwixt as twain. -All the Year Round.

Scarcely any defaulter of embezzler in any part of the land but owes his crime directly to speculation in Wall street, and examination of his accounts reveals this. Were it not for hope Wall street would be desorted. The experience of tens of thousands detors no one from trying to avoid the quicksands in which they have been lost. Each man is convinced that he knows better, that he is shrewder, more intelligent, than his neighbor. Hope, plus egotism, drives most speculators on to their fate. You can tell them nothing; they are aware of it all. They are infatuated by their own vanity, and their superabundance of expectation. They go the same round; arrive at the same end; meet the same fate. Yet each has the temerity to believe that he will prove . "You have been a stock-broker a long the exception. Many of these over-confident speculators come from New England, the South and West, and often with large sums of money, though not large enough to achieve what they are continually attempting. A quarter or half a million is a great deal of money in the country, and a comfortable amount anywhere under any ordinary circumstances. But for operating in the stock market it is insignificant. The adventurers do not understand this, however. They do not remember that certain mon in Wall street can command $50,000,000 to $100,000,- mighty little business. But they are people call it luck. Bah, there's no such thing as luck." "But is not your judgment fallible ? One can not always keep on the right side of the market?"
