The fundamental principles of the new Constitution thus agreed on by the custing vote of North Carolina, were however not agreeable to the New York delegates who all retired except Hamilton, and he remained a mere spectator in the convention.

On July 26, the general resolutions adopted as the basis of a Constitution were referred to a committee of five who, a fortnight later, reported a rough draft of a Constitution. There was some dispute over certain articles, but the ground work was accepted. After a month consumed in discussion, the instrument was referred to a committee to revise its style-and when four days later they reported the perfect instrument, the word National was not to de found in it.

Such is the story of the framing of the Constitution.

It has been regarded as the most perfect form of government ever devised from what the large States proposed; it is somewhat different from what the small States wanted. Whatever its merits, it owes its existence to the action of North Carolina in the convention. Well may a grateful posterity, now after the lapse of a century, applaud the work of North Carolinians in securing the adoption by the convention of those fundamental principles on which it is framed. In a measure it is North Carolina's gift to the people of the United States, and we should blazon forth the glories of her handiwork. - News-Observer.
