Watterson at Asheville.

Hon. Henry Watterson, editor of the Louisville Courier-Journal, delivered Lis famous lecture at Asheville on 'Money and Mor. 1-," a week or two ago. Among some of the spey things he aid were the following:

We have all thought of the alvant g s of money; dreamed of them by night and by day.

Money is relative, very relative. The owner of ten or fifteen in Hions is looked down upon by the owner of one hundred and fifty millions; and they both regard the one time mill onare as a beggar. It is not only relative but is full of illusions and delusions.

We have all been struck with the negic word, and have dreamed our quirer.

honestly acquired and still better if it is honestly applied.

I should hate to think that money is a positive bar to salvation, but it is nearly so.

It is true also that the possession of money will harden and lower ten times to one where it will soften and elevate. How many have entered the bank all grace, and come out all gall!

Webster and Clay both deplored the fact that they had entered public life: each had fixed his heart on the White House and each failed of his ambition, Both died unhappy. George E. Prentiss told me shortly before he died that if Clay had been elected to the presidency, he would have been the wrethedest man alive and the biggest har in the univer-e. He had made promises-conscious and unconscious, expressel and implied-which he could never have discharged.
