Feels a Lot Better

When Black-Draught Relieves Constipation

From many states come reports like the following from Mr. W. M. Henderson, of Jasper, Fla.: "I have been taking Theodor's Black-Draught twenty years. I take it for constipation that gives me a dull, tired, aching feeling, and I have headache, too. Black-Draught relieves me of this trouble. After a few doses, I feel as good as new. I keep it in my home. I have a big family. When one of us is ailing (from constipation), we take Black-Draught and almost always feel a lot better. It has been worth its weight in gold to my family." ... Sold in 25¢ packages. "Children like the Syrup."

Traveling Around America

HERE is one man who is a booster for chewing gum. He's a chicle bleeder in Guatemala who earns his living by tapping zapote trees for chicle, the chewy ingredient in our chewing gum. The bleeder's chief equipment is a heavy rope and a long-bladed bolo. With a loop of the rope he encircles both himself and the tree. Leaning back against this rope for support he walks barefoot up the trunk, cutting a zigzag trail up the side of the tree with his bolo as he ascends. Thick, milky-colored sap released by the bolo trickles down the incisions into a rubberized bag fastened to the trunk in a groove made by an upward slash of the bolo.

When the sack is full the ground workers empty it into a large iron pot over a fire, stir it continually with a long pole until it has boiled sufficiently, then pour it on cloth placed on the ground. After it is dry it is molded into blocks weighing 25 pounds each, transported by mules out of the jungle, and shipped from San Jose, the port where "Santa" ships dock on their weekly cruises between New York and the West Coast.

Chicle camps in which the bleeders and their families live are usually very primitive settlements made up of crude shelters with roofs of dried palm leaves supported on poles. And, since the camps must be established wherever the most productive trees happen to be, they are often located many miles from the nearest town, in the heart of the jungles. But the chicle bleeder doesn't complain for his wages are comparatively high—

Steals Black Cats

There's one brave soul in Salisbury who apparently thinks that bad luck can be offset by a double dose of trouble.

Some one stole two black cats that belonged to Marvin Brantley, business man of this city, and no trace has been found of same. Brantley and others world like to know the person who scorns all tokens of trouble—and takes his fun in double doses!
