The Naturalist's Column (By Frazer G. Poole)

Pink clouds in the sky, the setting sun streaming across the water, white caps out at sea, green water churned into frothing cream, palmettos casting long, dark shadows on the dunes, and in the cove a thousand birds crying, screaming, darting, fighting for each particle of food—

A scene, not quiet, yet beautiful in its pure naturalness. In the air and on the sands a thousand birds were feeding. Hundreds of caspian terns, with their blood red bills and black crowns, skimmed low over the water or flew in erratic circles over the heads of their fellows. Out over the sea, brown pelicans folded their wings and dived like great brown thunderbolts into the ocean. They emerged from the surface and, after rolling quietly in the trough of the waves for a minute, rose only to dive again. In all the dives that were executed that morning only one missed his fish. Along the rippling sands of the beach ran sandpeeps and pectoral sandpipers, running forward to get the food left on the sand by the receding wave and then quickly running back to escape the incoming one. Black terns flew gracefully over the sand, their black plumage glowing in the rays of the dying sun. Herring gulls settled on the water and fed on scraps in the waves, never ceasing their raucous cries. Then over the waves came a flock of graceful black birds, the unique black skimmers of our southern coast. It was the first time I had ever observed their peculiar manner of feeding and I got keen pleasure out of watching their blade-like bills plough the surface of the water in search of food, as they skimmed gracefully over the sea.

Then suddenly it was over, for like a great lumbering ox a human crashed into their midst. With wild screams and frightened cries they scattered. The great heron that had been feeding with them flew off down the inlet; the pelicans soared into the sky. The terns and gulls scattered up and down the beach. But I, the Ox, turned from the bar and walked slowly away. The sun had set, the sky was edged in gold, the palmettos were dark shadows, the birds had gone, the surf boomed on. Across the dunes came the salt tang of the sea—but the beauty was gone and I was alone.

Milestones of American Genius

Monument to the "father of the American Navy", at Washington.

JOHN PAUL JONES

ALTHOUGH his exploits in the War of Independence were woven into the heroic legends of our country, the mortal remains of Admiral John Paul Jones, the "father of the American navy", rested for more than a century in an obscure graveyard in Paris.

Only in 1905, President Theodore Roosevelt sent a convoy of warships to bring the body to American soil for honorable interment at Annapolis. Congress at the same time ordered the erection of a suitable monument as a perpetual reminder of the gallant sea hero's contribution to American freedom. The monument, shown in the sketch above, stands in the nation's capital.

The admiral began his life as John Paul, adopting the name Jones after the death of an elder brother who had inherited it from a foster-father. He was born in Scotland on July 8, 1747, and began his sea-going life at the age of twelve, when he had apprenticed to a merchant trader.

When John was twenty-six, his elder brother died and left him plantations in Virginia. He decided to make America his home. With the outbreak of the Revolutionary war, John Paul Jones, though still under thirty, offered his services in building up a Continental navy.

His naval achievements were many and varied, his youth merely adding glory to his deeds. The historic battle between his little Bon Homme Richard and the giant warship Serapis marked the climax of his victories for the American cause. Congress ordered a medal struck in his honor. France, allied with the colonists, showered him with marks of esteem, and Catherine the Great of Russia engaged his help in fighting the Turks.

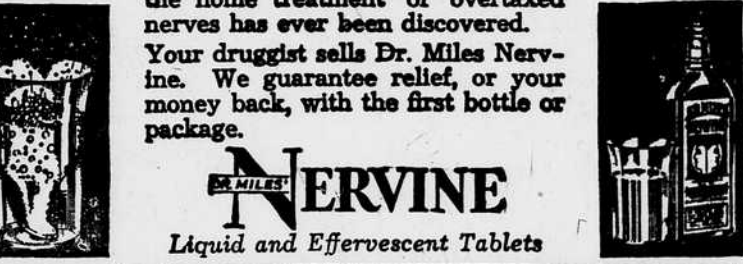

Sick and heart-broken over court intrigues directed against him in St. Petersburg, he went to Paris, where he died on July 18, 1792, in the midst of the French Revolution. Into his forty-five years of life he had crowded achievements which fix his name forever on the American roll of genius.
